

SLOVACS BITTER ENEMIES TO MAGYAR FRIENDLY TO RUSSIA

WASHINGTON, May 4.—"In the Carpathian uplands, through which vast Russian armies are seeking to force entrance into Hungary, is Slovakia. There are about 2,500,000 of those Slovaks, and they are among the bitterest enemies that the Hungarians, or Magyars, has made for himself. Ever since the invading Magyar wrecked the brightest political hopes of the Slovaks—the kingdom of Great Moravia of the 9th century—on the field of Pressburg in 907, there has been deep ill-will between the peoples."

Thus begins a statement of the National Geographic society concerning the Slovaks of Hungary, whose fate as a people hangs in the balance today, and of whom there are some 700,000 in the United States. The statement continues:

Maintain Individuality

"Through all the centuries that have elapsed since the establishment of the Magyar power in Europe, the Slovaks have held the position of a conquered and subject people. Their conquerors, the Magyars, have looked upon them as an inferior race, and have seldom spared their sensibilities. The Slovaks are a heavy, peaceful, poverty-dulled people, though, true to their race instincts, they have resisted successfully all attempts of the ruling nation toward assimilation, and they have remained a foreign, despised and neglected element on the fringe and within the administration of the Magyar kingdom."

"The bulk of this folk, pushed against the northern mountains, lies behind a line drawn from Pressburg eastward through Zemplin to the Galician border. Practically all of this region is composed of wooded mountains and broken hills, and is of such a nature that unremitting labor within its confines brings in a competence, but never the reward of wealth. Thus, the Slovaks have had little material aid with which to carry on their struggle with the Magyars. Their resistance has been made in poverty; has been largely passive, but nevertheless, has had a stolid, immobile quality which has defied misfortune."

Movie Screen Will Tell You What You Are, Says Mary Fuller

CHAPTER II

The angels are supposed to be looking after our souls. It is our duty to look after our physical selves. We must try to make the temple fit for the spirit which dwells within. The screen is a pitiless critic.

The absence of color makes it all the more so. It shows up our mannerisms and our faults, a slouchy carriage, a gawky gait, a sagging shoulder, an unpleasant manner of talking, an expressionless face, an untidy method of combing the hair. The camera lens is the uncompromising eye that sees all.

It is sometimes painful to see ourselves as the screen shows us, but it is of immense benefit in helping us cure ourselves of faults of manner. In that regard we have the advantage of actors on the regular stage who can never see themselves.

Now to look well before the camera, it is necessary to feel well. I have not a rugged constitution, but I manage to keep in continuous good health by not eating too much, sleeping enough, breathing plenty of fresh air in both my sleeping and waking hours, breathing deeply, being regular in my habits, and trying to fill my mind with vital and healthy ideas.

One needs a daily morning bath, plenty of drinking water, a shampoo and manicle once a week, plenty of work, mental activity, good friends and some decent amusement.

As hair is woman's crowning glory, much attention should be given to it. It should have plenty of brushing and washing. It should be spread out on the pillow at night so it can air, so it can "breathe."

Teeth should have daily attention and half-yearly looking after by a good dentist. Hands should never be allowed to chap. Feet should be bathed every night after the day's confinement in shoes. An air bath after the morning tub is good, the pores of the body are so continually stifled in clothes.

And one more big rule:

Don't worry about little things and don't fear things that are never going to happen.

FLOYD MARY FULLER

"The Slovaks occupied the territory where they are found today between the 6th and 7th centuries. They were one of the most helpless of all the forward waves of Slav migration. In language, they were most nearly related to the Czechs of all the Slavs. Czechish was, for a long time, used as the literary language of the Slovaks. Temperamentally, however, the Czech and the Slovak contrast sharply; for the Czech is fiery, excitable, and quick, where the Slovak is docile, stolid and slow."

Related to Czechs

"The Slovaks are a peasant people. Their aristocracy long ago submitted to the power, the wealth and the higher culture of the Magyar, and became thoroughly Magyarized. The peasants, indifferent in their want, continued in a close corporation of Slavism in their mountain villages. Despite the development in recent generations of a determination on the part of the ruling Magyars to force the Slovaks to merge into the Magyar race at any cost, these peasants have retained their Slavonic tongue, Slavonic names, and, even, have gained a keener sense of racial integrity."

Favor Pan Slavism

"The Magyars have forbidden the use of Slovak in the schools. They have denied these people the right of organization, a native press and a native pulpit—but in vain. For, at the beginning of the 19th century, enthused by a like movement among Austria's subject Czechs, the Slovak leaders wrought a literary language out of the jumble of native dialects, and began the work of more than 100 years of awakening and intensifying in their people a racial patriotism. This work has accomplished wonders in the face of unrelenting opposition. Slovak numbers are too few to encourage dreams of independence and, so, of all the Slavonic peoples without the fold of Russia, the Slovaks are perhaps the most wholeheartedly in favor of the Pan-Slavism program."
