WOMAN PRACTICES DENTISTRY AMONG WILDEST ANIMALS How would you like to be a wild animal dentist? To extract fill and doctor the incisors and molars of man-killing tigers and lions? That's a funny profession for a woman to take up, isn't it? Yet, that's just what Miss Mabel Stark, whose picture appears above, does for a livelihood. "Wild Animal Dentist," reads her professional card. Miss Stark is seen in the picture examining the teeth of her pet tiger, Duke. Captivated big cat animals are subject to toothache of the most violent character, and unless given some attention will often starve themselves to death. Duke had given signs of distress by refusing to eat his food, and an examination proved that one of his eye teeth was in a bad state of ulceration. He was ordered placed in the operating cage—a steel-barred inclosure equipped with the necessary appliances for just such cases. First a collar was placed around his neck to which was attached a stout chain—a rope wouldn't do, for Mr. Tiger would cut a rope in two in a jiffy with his sharp, powerful teeth. Then a net rope was thrown over his body and in his struggle to free himself his feet became firmly entangled in its meshes and his body was drawn to the side of the cage and securely bound. His feet were tied with stout ropes and then Miss Stark entered the cage. A piece of iron pipe was forced between the tiger's jaws and in a few moments the big cat was minus a tooth—not pulled, but sawed off. Duke was a kitten tiger, about three years old, and it was discovered that the aching member was one of his milk teeth, and to pull it would be liable to injure the new toothless just showing through the gums. A small steel-cutting saw did the work, and without pain, for Miss Stark practices painless dentistry only. Miss Stark, along with her ability to stop their toothaches, is also a proficient trainer of wild animals.
