DUNDONALD'S DEATH

BARBARIC methods of warfare, revived by German "efficiency," show how the highest civilization has sunk to the depths of the lowest savagery.

Poisonous gas, first used by the Germans, was discarded centuries ago by all nations as too inhuman and destructive for civilized man.

At the time, the war with Napoleon was being waged, and Dundonald claimed: "We have an infallible means of securing at one blow our military supremacy."

During the Crimean war Dundonald revived his "secret war plan" for the total destruction of the enemy's fleet and offered to conduct in person an attack upon Sevastopol and destroy it within a few hours without loss to the attacking force.

It is apparent that if Dundonald were alive today his offer would be eagerly accepted, at least by the kaiser, for his method must be the acme of efficiency in murder.

But the poisonous gas, and even "Dundonald's death," are not as barbarous as the sinking of ocean liners and merchant ships with their offerings of innocents.

Man is demonstrating the fact that he is unfit to live and fulfilling the law of evolution by eliminating himself as the unfit from existence by scientific self-destruction.

By all means, let Great Britain, if it still possesses the secret, revive the terrible method of destroying life invented by Dundonald and make a quick job of universal annihilation.
