AERIAL BATTLES AT ARRAS DEEDS OF GREAT THRILLS

From a Staff Correspondent of the Associated Press.

BRITISH HEADQUARTERS IN FRANCE, April 30.—Out of the high thin air where the fighting biplanes fly in a sort of dream-world of adventure, have come within the last few days still more wondrous stories of dauntless deeds and feats of aerial tilting to spread the welcome glamor of romance over the more sordid side of the war. Above the British lines and far within the enemy territory, the blue spring skies have been filled with daring planes that seem to flash in and out among the bits of floating cloud with the speed of the very sunbeams that sparkle and play upon their silver sides and all but transparent wings.

Virtually all the visible machines bear the red, white and blue markings of the allies. It is seldom that hostile machines with the maltese cross upon their spreading wings venture across the fighting lines.

Germans Avoid Air Fights

The British aviators report that it is difficult just now to get German aviators into close fighting. They say that the Germans appear unwilling to engage in that sort of warfare and continually attempt to break off the combats.

Two fast British machines, far in the enemy's domain, saw what appeared to be a great flock of German planes headed toward the British lines. The two British airmen climbed a couple of thousand feet to have a better look at the strangers. They then saw that it was a formation of fourteen machines composed of fighting scouts and heavier two-seaters, probably intent upon a bombing raid. The odds were rather heavy against them, but the British fliers decided to have a go at the hostile airmen. For three-quarters of an hour there followed an extraordinary battle.

Two Against Fourteen

Having faster and better maneuvering machines, the young Britons played about their fourteen enemies like a pair of giant hornets. They dived at them, time and time again, firing bursts of machine gun bullets as they passed.

With superior speed and climb, the British machines were able to adopt such tactics as suited their purpose, and from the moment of the first attack the formation of the German machines began to break up.

After two of their machines had been set on fire and destroyed and a third sent spinning down to an undoubted fatal crash, the hostile squadron was completely disorganized, the surviving machines turning about and making for home.
