MYSTERY OF SNARE DRUM DEEPENS

The snare drum mystery grows deeper.

The drum has been found; now its owner cannot be located.

Rat-at-t-tat. Brrrr-brrrr. Meanwhile George Gates and Emil Mohr are greatly agitated.

And the innocent cause of so much commotion is lying in the baggage room of the Medford hotel awaiting to be claimed.

"Where is he?" soliloquizes Mohr.

"Tis darn funny," says Gates.

And Erwin D. Hill, Grand Army veteran, unaware that his precious drum is safe and not in the hands of some villyun, is still mourning its loss.

The identity of the owner of the car in which Hill left the drum during Wednesday's Patriotic parade is still unknown.

But he's an honest gent as witness after the parade, on not finding any owner for the instrument, he hurries the drum to the hotel, left it there and went home with the consciousness of duty well performed.

When Emil Mohr read of the missing drum yesterday afternoon he quickly notified Geo. Gates by phone where it was.

Not waiting a second, Gates cranks up a jitney, gets the drum and hastens to 607 King street, the address given him by Hill when the latter was hunting the drum. Not a second lost. But no such number can be found.

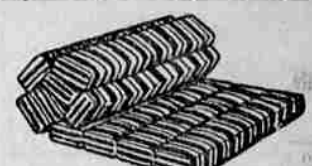

Rat-at-t-tat. Brrrr. Such a hullabaloo.

Savages are "keyed" by means of serial numbers. And are distributed by our own organization, not sold to middlemen in huge quantities and carried in stock sometimes for a year or more.

We know just where a casing is and how long it has been there. The minute a tire reaches the doubtful age, the point beyond which there is possibility of deterioration, it is replaced by a new casing.
