"KING WITHOUT COUNTRY" NOT YET RIGHT

WASHINGTON, June 26.—The Belgian army is larger, better equipped and more determined today than it was at the beginning of the war, said Lieutenant General LeClercq, military member of the Belgian mission, in an address last night to the National Press club. The general gave a graphic description of how twice, at Liege and at the Yser, his countrymen held up Germany's hordes, while the allies united in the rear, and told of the joy the Belgian soldiers would experience on sight of the American khaki.

"The king 'without a country,' General LeClercq said, 'is the expression the German papers use to designate our sovereign. This is not quite accurate. There remains a part of Belgium still unviolated. The Germans have not succeeded in passing the Yser. The Germans shall never conquer this small corner of our country. Besides rehabilitating their army, after terrible losses, the general declared his country has set up munitions factories abroad, one at Havre, with 15,000 workmen and two at Richmond, and Tetchworth in England with 35,000, while the Royal Belgian Lloyd, with $50,000,000 capital, assures transportation at sea.

The Belgian army now occupies a front of 22 miles with eight divisions, including two of cavalry. The land is low and flat, requiring millions of sand bags for defense.

"Nothing remains," said General LeClercq, "in the battle zone where once there were great fields filled with cattle, smiling Flemish farms and green trees. The only bright note, if I may so call it, are the graves of those who have poured out their blood for their native land, serving as an encouragement to their living comrades, to whom they say and incessantly repeat:

"'Avenge us; do your duty!'"

After picturing the destruction of men, women and children that followed the fall of Liege, the general told of the Belgian attack upon the German flank before the battle of the Marne, of the brave defense of Antwerp, of the fighting at the Yser and finally of the inundation of Flanders to drive out the enemy and make solid the line thrown by the allies across the road to Calais.

Upon Belgium's first victory of the war at Liege the general dwelt at length. There, he said, his countrymen, barely one hundred thousand strong, met at least three times as many Germans, inflicted losses admitted by Germany to total 42,714 and paralyzed for thirteen days the great invasion, which, after forty years of methodical preparation, was expected to be irresistible.

"The Germans had organized a formidable war machine, whose wheels were adjusted with absolute precision," the general added. "The resistance of Belgium at Liege was the little grain of sand which threw the whole machinery out of gear at the very commencement, as it permitted the French to gain very precious time."

After picturing the destruction of

men, women and children that followed the fall of Liege, the general told of the Belgian attack upon the German flank before the battle of the Marne, of the brave defense of Antwerp, of the fighting at the Yser and finally of the inundation of Flanders to drive out the enemy and make solid the line thrown by the allies across the road to Calais.
