saying it was always the downfall of an earl. Should he find it his duty to enforce the government, he said, he hoped that he would have the courage to do so in direct and immediate fact. He thought it was not the business of parliament to continually inquire into the conduct of executive officers of the war. Enquiry, he said, had been done enough of such occasions already.

Mr. Asquith said that when in past days the decision to dissolve it would be accepted by the government. He had never yet known an adverse vote on any proposal made by the government. He had encouraged to help the government in the prosecution of the war and in defeating the great purpose of the war and the cause for which the allies were struggling.

Mr. Asquith said neither he nor his colleagues had any intention of dissolving parliament. Should the government be defeated on any question, he would not hesitate to advise the dissolution of parliament and appeal to the country.

on which must have no regard to the kind of work done, or the effect upon the individual workers, but with those very considerations in mind.

"With the matter of overtime as with hours of service the commission believes that the existing rules and conditions of pay must should not be disturbed during the period of the war.

Women Employes.

"Since the war women have entered the shops, have engaged in handling freight and baggage and have even been employed upon car tracks. Much of this work requires a physical effort beyond the strength of women, and some of it is carried on under conditions menacing to health, safety and morals. As the war takes an increasing number of men, women must in some degree take the place of men. They should be cared for. Their duties should not be such as to injure their health. Their hours should be reasonably short. Their working conditions should be healthful and fitted to their needs. And their pay, when they do the full work of men, should be the same as that of men.

"The investigation of the commission disclosed many inequities of pay in the same branches of service. In every case where the same service is rendered there should be the same pay without regard to sex or race."
