ALLIES AWAKEN SIBERIA FROM LONG LETHARGY

Hopeless Division of Sentiment on Every Subject Except Need of Intervention—Revolutionary Politics of Harbin, City of Intrigue, Vividly Described.

By Burton Knisely.
(Staff Correspondent.)

HARBIN, Manchuria, Sept. 2.—In the last weeks before the Siberian intervention everybody in Harbin, thru which troops are now passing against the Bolsheviki-German prisoner forces, was asking daily:

"Why don't the allies come in? When will they?"

The dirty, awkward and yet not ugly town, a 15-years growth to a population of 100,000, was already politically, as it is now militarily, the meeting place of five peoples—Russia, China, Japan, America and Czech-Slovaks. To all, within its uneasy, red atmosphere, it seemed a world center of intrigue, one of the most romantic spots on civilization's map.

From old Harbin to New Town, and to the wharfs of Priestan—the three widely separated divisions of Harbin—men of many uniforms, many errands and many schemes come and go mysteriously.

Mixture of Races

Until the last few days nothing has been open and above-board. Even the droshky horses seem excited as, one hitched in front and one at the side, they gallop the odd low-hung carriages jouncing over cobblestones where no other vehicle would be tolerated to human bones.

Shaggy-capped Cossacks and stripling cadets, officers from the two reactionary armies, Orloff's forces formerly at Pogranitchnaia on the road to Vladivostok and Semenoff's corps at the western border of Manchuria, officers in blue pants, in buff pants and in scarlet, American railway engineers in khaki, Japanese in uniform and Japanese in civilian dress, opium smugglers and horsebuyers, Russian railroad wormen and Chinese laborers, military investigators of allied nations and possible German spies; beautiful women, officers' wives, refugees' daughters, smugglers concubines—but all beautiful with the never-failing beauty of the Russian people whose women are the fairest and whose men the most stalwart and handsome I have ever seen—these types and many others eddy to and fro, to be observed from street corner or hotel bench.

And all the while, night and day, the Chinese troops patrol the streets and stand sentinel at every intersection.

Diverse Elements Scheme

All this year these diverse elements of the many-colored city have schemed and planned and danced and drunk, and smoked the inevitable Russian cigaret on the edge of the powder magazine, the aell the rest of Russia is to them, while they waited, waited and waited for help.

Of the newly-arrived American they asked wistfully, eagerly and with vexation: "Why don't the allies come in?"

To the east lay Vladivostok and the Siberian coast, all until recently in the hands of the soviets, the Bolshevik government. Westward at the other Manchusian front the Bolsheviki aided by German prisoners, were pressing back Semenoff's forces. And until the interventionist troops began to land in Siberia these people of Harbin, alone of all their kind, were safe—only because they were in the heart of a Chinese province, in a city which was Russian because it belonged to a Russian railroad.

Victims of War

In the high-lying residence districts of Nowe Gorod, or the New Town, of Harbin, live the Russian intelligentsia, that is, the aristocrats, well-to-do, and middle class who ran away from the revolution. There these victims of the war's class struggle are getting up their spirits again, now that the troops have landed at Vladivostok—getting up their spirits altho every home has had its hearse.

Harbin is "no place for a nervous woman." Everything "goes." Everything always "has gone." In 1904, during the Russo-Japanese war, when Harbin, still a village, became the commercial center behind the Russian lines and started on its career as a city which will make it eventually the St. Lo is of Siberia, the Russian dukes and generals reveled there with their chorus girls and in their champagne. The army contractors and the women followers of the army seem thus at Harbin's birth to have promulgated as the custom of the place that spirit of freedom which, as elsewhere in Russia today, is often license, socially as well as politically.

Crisis Is Reached

Something Oriental remains in the sex attitude of the Russian people, of whom it has been said "they wore their shirts outside and were the most western of the eastern nations; they tucked their blouses in their pants and became the most eastern of the western nations." They were the last of the white races to leave the Asiatic cradle of the Caucasian peoples, and their youth shows in their unrestraint, as in other things.

Something which the Puritan would liken to immorality has been heightened, also, by the chaos of war and revolution. Harbin's proud boast that any man might find there any game he wanted may be compared for the American to a louder echo into more modern times of the old lawlessness of our early western mining camps.

This was only the froth. Underneath things were serious. A crisis had come, and passed. The forces of Orloff and Semenoff, reactionary leaders supported from Harbin, had lost ground to the Bolsheviki, had been ordered by China to keep their battles off Chinese territory, and had faced dissolution. Orloff's troops had been removed from Pogranitchnaia and partially disbanded. Communications with Vladivostok was cut off by the Bolshevik front at Grodekevo.

Asked Allied Aid

The Far Eastern committee had met in Harbin, and asked immediate allied aid. It represented the socalled aristocrats. Two night later another less conservative committee met and tried to revise the Far Eastern committee's plea. Wherever two men got together in Harbin there were three opinions—on everything except the necessity of some help from somewhere.

It was apparent that Siberia, like the rest of Russia, had fallen flat on her face. She could not pick herself up. In this crisis the people were powerless and the "intelligentsia" were useless.

And then—bit by bit leaked thru the news of the Czech-Slovak successes in western Siberia, of the spontaneous generation of a new Siberian government, and the likelihood of allied intervention to support this new nucleus of a new Siberia, and perhaps a new Russia.

The coming true of these rumors has put Harbin back on the track, where she is now getting up steam.

WORKERS PLEDGE LOYAL HELP IN WINNING WAR

"Every Tool in Every Essential Industry is a Weapon and a Weapon Wielded for the Same Purpose That Our Army Rifle is Wielded," Says President—Labor Day Parades.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 2.—Labor day was observed today thruout the United States. President Wilson, in a Labor Day message, laid great stress on the part that labor had in the winning of the war, saying in part:

"Every tool in every essential industry is a weapon and a weapon wielded for the same purpose that an army rifle is wielded."

Director General McAdoo issued an order that railroad employes be permitted to participate in celebration of the day where essential operations would not be hampered.

Director General Schwab of the Emergency Fleet corporation, in a cablegram to the American troops in France, gave those forces assurances that everything possible was being done in that industry.

President Gompers of the American Federation of Labor, now abroad in a message to the American people pledged the fullest support of organized labor to the cause of the republic.

Parade in Chicago

CHICAGO, Sept. 2.—The largest parade in the local history of labor day marched thru the streets today headed by the Great Lakes naval training school band of 400. The opening of the government's war exposition was a feature of the celebration.

In New York City

NEW YORK, Sept. 2.—Labor's army, nearly 150,000 strong tramped the streets of New York today with a slogan that was echoed by the thousands of spectators. In Manhattan 75,000 union men and workers passed in review before William B. Wilson, secretary of the department of labor; Governor Whitman, Mayor Hylan and other officials.

United States soldiers and sailors stationed in this vicinity acted as an escort for the mayors, while army aviators hovered over the procession and dropped "win the war" leaflets from the clouds. After the parades loyalty meetings were held.

Portland Parades

PORTLAND, Sept. 2—A great parade in which thousands of working men marched was the feature here of today's celebration of Labor day. Shipyard workers with their bands and floats formed a notable feature. Later patriotic exercises were held at the municipal auditorium.

An outstanding feature of the parade was the wearing by the marchers of badges lettered with the words: "Set Mooney Free." Banners with a similar motto were carried in line.
