WAR'S GREATEST INVENTION IS PHONE TO AVIATORS

The wireless telephone set used on the western front by allied aviators during the last six months of the war is proclaimed by the war department, "the greatest invention of the war." Col. Clarence C. Culver of Washington is the inventor. By this new invention it was possible to communicate with aviators after they had soared thousands of feet aloft, and to direct their movements. Thus beginners were sent up without instructors, and were directed by the flight commanders. The invention followed eight years of experiment engaged in by Col. Culver and other wireless wizards, military and civilian, and was completed at San Diego, Cal., last February.

MANUFACTURERS TO COMBINE FOR EXPORT BUSINESS

WASHINGTON, Dec. 5.—American manufacturers are rapidly forming export associations which plan to carry the products of the United States to every nation on earth, to create and enlarge demands for goods "Made in America" and to furnish cargoes for the American merchant marines to transport over the seven seas. The trade invasion of other countries will begin in earnest when Europe has been supplied with food and reconstruction materials and the world gets back to a normal peace basis.

To avoid collision with provisions of the Sherman anti-trust act and the Clayton law, the new associations are filing statements of their purposes with the federal trade commission, taking advantage of the Webb bill permitting such combinations solely for the purpose of export trade. This act enables Americans to combine their strength to compete successfully with similar combinations in other countries. Up to the present, 52 statements have been filed, embracing combinations of machinery and tool makers, paper makers, lumber manufacturers and general exporters.

As a general rule, the combinations have been effected along the line of trade associations—that is, all manufacturers in the producing of a certain article or series of articles are banding together, somewhat along the lines followed by the Germans in pushing goods to all corners of the earth before the war.

Some experts believe that this system is wrong and that the combinations should be effected along the department store idea—that is, that each combination should include one or two manufacturers of each article and that the association should be able to furnish everything from a pin to a locomotive. They argue this system would save much expense in maintaining salesmen and branch agencies and that just as strong organizations can be effected as under the other plan. Advocates of the one-line-of-business idea contend, however, that their system, which sends out highly specialized salesmen to sell one article only and which allocates all orders among the manufacturers embraced in the association, makes the stronger combination to meet foreign competition only.
