Grants Pass is financing an irrigation project which will employ the waters of the Rogue in stabilizing the production of its fertile valley, says the Pgrland Journal. It is an enterprise which beckons success not only because the feasibility of southern Oregon irrigation has been proven, but because resident owners have assumed responsibility for the project and they have declared that in future sub-divisions the price of land shall be based upon its productivity. Had one or two other southern Oregon communities in the past wisely restrained speculative inflation of land values they would be in more hopeful position today. To charge for agricultural land more than the land can return in production is always disastrous to any community.

INCE SPECTACLE WITH MANY THRILLS AT LIBERTY

Thomas H. Ince has produced a really great motion picture with "reds"—real and natural—as the background. It is called "Dangerous Hours" and opened a two-day's run at the Liberty theatre last evening. Ever if you were not in the slightest concerned as to whether or not this country goes to the dogs, you would enjoy this picture; if, like every good American, the future of America is of vital interest to you, "Dangerous Hours" has a double appeal. Not only is it a mighty enthralling photoplay; it is a warning.

Tomorrow, local admirers of youthful Charles Ray will have an opportunity to see him in another of his inimitable country boy characterizations, "Alarm Clock Andy."

Chest colds and sore throat lead to grip. Stop them at once with Wizard Oil before they can develop into dangerous influenza.
