What's a Battery Separator?

Separators are a very essential part of modern storage battery, according to M. B. Walker of Auto Electric Equipment Co., USL Service Station representative for this section, during a discussion on batteries in his office yesterday.

"Separators," he asserted, "are to prevent the positive and negative plates from coming into contact and thus creating injurious short circuits. A separator is not merely a piece of wood sized and shaped to fit the narrow spaces between the plates. It is a specially shaped piece of a special kind of wood, which is not requisitioned for work in a battery until after it has gone through several processes and received special treatment."

"Separators are cut from seasoned native wood, following which they are subjected to a careful chemical treatment to remove any elements which might ruin the battery. They are of sufficient thickness to insure rapid diffusion of the electrolyte through the pores. Before use the separators are kept under water in special treating tanks in the USL Service Station."

"Perforated rubber separators are used in batteries other than those of the starter type. We have found, however, that perforated rubber separators in starting service reduce the starting capacity of the batteries at least a third. If a better all round material for separators than properly selected and treated wood is ever discovered, you may be sure you will see it in USL batteries."
