A Vancouver, Wn., dispatch in the Oregonian is as follows: "A. J. Anderson; did you ever hear of him? Well, A. J. Anderson is none other than Bud Anderson, former contender for the lightweight boxing championship. At that time Bud's name was known all over the United States and he was met by a brass band when he returned from California with a string of victories which placed him within a short distance of the title as a specimen of perfect manhood. Today the story is different. Bud started suit in the superior court today against the Industrial Insurance commission to have its award of $2900 reversed. Bud was working in the shipyard during the war and a man with an air gun almost killed the former pugilist. He claims he is totally disabled, and that the sum of $2900 was wholly inadequate to support him. He suffered great pain, had two operations, and the doctors tell him he will never be strong again. The decision to allow him $2900 was made November 29, 1920."
