Ben C. Sheldon is more sensitive than stout gentlemen are supposed to be. Someone said that he was the father of more bills than any other member, or words to that effect. Just to get even, Sheldon has taken an oath not to introduce a single measure. He intends giving all of his suggestions to the roads and highways committee, or any other committee where they fit in, and not sponsor anything. One of his ideas is to differentiate between gasoline for motor cars and gasoline for other engines. He thinks the non-motor car gasoline could be colored. Back of the idea is a new system of licensing automobiles by the amount of gasoline they consume, rather than horsepower.—The Oregonian. 251*
