

Local and Personal

The distinction of being the first guests at the Crater lake lodge this year goes to Misses C. and W. C. Book of San Francisco, who came in from the lake on a truck with Alex Sparrow yesterday afternoon, after having been there since last Friday. The young ladies are guests at the Holland for a few days and are enthusiastic over their wintry experiences at the lake. They went in from the Klamath side, having to hike it much in operation yet they found quarters in one nook of the structure and ate their meals with O. C. Heinlein and his crew of electricians who are at work there. They much enjoyed this camping out life and tramping around through the snow.

Star Actors Use "Stage Door" in Entering the White House

WASHINGTON, June 21.—The White House—theatre of the national drama—has its "stage door."

On a side street, back from shaded Pennsylvania avenue and within easy access of rear entrances of the state, war and navy building, in the White House "stage door." Through this door enter most of the principals in the national drama.

The "stage door" of the White House is really the entrance to the executive offices. Those who are familiar with White House business methods generally use the "stage door" entrance, and it is only the uninitiated and the very formal who seek the president at the front entrance of the White House.

The "stage door" is guarded. Officers Dalrymple and Kelly, who are just as keen eyed as any guardian of Broadway's stage entrances, cast their glances over all who enter and are the first official greeters when the "players" enter.

The writer concludes that "big apple crops are scheduled alone for New England, the Hudson valley, Washington, Oregon and California."
