The condition of a portion of the foundation under the court house, exposed in excavation work preparatory to erecting the new vault, is a direct refutation of many times repeated assertions that the court house is in a practically ruinous condition. The foundation, constructed of massive blocks of stone, shows absolutely no evidence of weakness and in as firm and substantial today as the day on which it was constructed more than forty years ago. It is, perhaps, not too much to say that there is no building foundation in the county so well calculated to bear the weight of its superstructure as the one underneath the county court house.—Jacksonville Post.
