

Local and Personal

The embargo on perishable goods which was announced again today by the Southern Pacific has thrown local fruit growers into anxiety over the disposition of the local crop of Bartlett pears. The Oregon Growers announce that they intend to pack very few Bartlett pears and that they have arranged for the disposition of practically all of their Bartlett pears with canneries. They are shipping daily to canneries in Salem and smaller shipments are being made to California canneries. The local cold storage warehouses of the association have a storage capacity of 75 cars of pears according to officials of the association.
