1950 FATALITIES IN COAL MINES THE PAST YEAR

WASHINGTON, Jan.—Reports received by the United States Bureau of Mines from state mine inspectors indicate that 1950 fatalities in the coal industry during 1922. This is a tentative figure based on actual reports covering eleven months and an estimate for December based upon the probable output of coal for the month. The estimate represents a reduction of 23 fatalities from the total for 1921, but will not represent a lowering of the death rate. In relation to the quantity of coal produced, the accident rate will be actually higher than for the previous year, the report said. In a summarization of the year's record, bureau statisticians point out that from the first of April to the last of August a large part of the industry was closed down on account of a miners strike; the production of fresh-mined anthracite was completely stopped; and the output of soft coal was cut in half. This stoppage naturally eliminated the accidents that would have occurred had the mines been in operation. The net result, therefore, was that the five-month period of the strike showed an abnormally low number of fatal accidents, and this reduction will, of course, be reflected in the total number of fatalities for the year. The reduction in loss of life, despite the strike shutdown, was NOT as large as it might have been because of the large number of lives lost during the year by mine explosions. The outstanding feature of the mine year was what the bureau officials call "major" disasters, accidents in which at least five lives were lost. There were thirteen of these during the year, eleven of which were explosions, which together cost the lives of 251 men. During 1921 there were only five major accidents, with a loss of 34 lives. Only three of these were mine explosions and they resulted in only 21 deaths. The largest killed 11 men; the largest during the past year exacted 87 lives, while another took 77.
