

PLANNED IDEAL CITY OF WORLD KENTUCKY, U. S. A.

LOUISVILLE, Ky.—Picture a coterie of eighteenth century London gentlemen, fired with the spirit of the creator and pioneer, intently poring over a graphically illuminated chart of "the ideal city of the world," and visualizing "our" new city of the day when the virgin hills of that frontier region of the New World called Kentucky, beyond the ragged edge of the lands assimilated by those recalcitrant colonists—should rise this wonder city—"Lystra!"

"The chief city of Kentucky," was the designation put to Lystra on a London map of 1794. But Lystra never materialized.

Otis M. Mather of Hodgenville, Ky., student of early Kentucky history, tells of the intended metropolis. "The primeval forest still waves over the spot," Mr. Mather declared. "The site is located in the extreme eastern part of La Rue county, Kentucky, and the only thing that marks it is the postoffice and general store of Glenning, a little village several miles away."

Mudraugh Hill, a landmark in the vicinity, was to be the approximate center of the city and is still there. Lystra was to cover 15,000 square acres, divided into twenty-five blocks each block with its individual park. Streets were to be 100 feet wide, and visionary structures and improvements were located and planned—on a map in London.

But the Englishmen never came to Kentucky. In the days that have elapsed since, however, the Bluegrass country to the east of Lystra's proposed location has been transformed into a prosperous region known as one of the richest communities in the "New World."
