SHAKESPEARE'S BIRTHDAY.

THREE HUNDRED and fifty-nine years ago today William Shakespeare was born. Four of the dramatic successes of the present New York season were Romeo and Juliet, Hamlet, Merchant of Venice and Othello.

No higher tribute to Shakespeare's genius could be imagined than this—survival for three centuries and a half. For the past century there probably hasn't been a month when some play of Shakespeare's hasn't been presented in some country, in some language.

The life of the average modern play is about three months, a few sensational successes, usually made so by the popularity and peculiar genius of some "star," may live for three years and a half, but when they finally disappear, they disappear forever.

And yet when Shakespeare was alive, writing plays, acting and fousting with his convivial companions, he was regarded by his contemporaries as a second rater. Ben Jonson alone of his dramatic rivals, appreciated his genius. And Ben was rather scornful. Shakespeare he said, lacked "art." His knowledge of Greek and Latin was painfully deficient.

This was quite natural. Ben was a Cambridge graduate and had a coat of arms of ancient vintage. The "Swan of Avon" was a butcher's son, with only a common school education, and according to some historians bought a coat of arms with his wife's dowry.
Judgements were influenced by social distinctions far more in the Elizabethan Age than today.

Nevertheless, in a certain sense Ben was probably right. Shakespeare did lack "art." He was not a master technician. He was neither a Latin nor a Greek scholar. But he knew life. The marvel of his work is its vitality. He was the world's first great realist. He accepted romance and melodrama, he frankly borrowed most of his plots, but he put the very breath of life into his characters,—literally saturated his pages with exuberance, reality and action.

Shakespeare has been sentimentalized. The immortality of his work is mainly due to his refusal to sentimentalize.

"I love a ballad in print o' life," he made one of his characters say, "for then we are sure they are true."

The Bard of Avon always wanted to be sure "they were true."

"To gild refined gold, to paint the lily, To throw perfume on the violet,
To smooth the ice or add another hue Unto the rainbow, or with taper light To seek the beauteous eye of Heaven to garnish Is wasteful and ridiculous excess."

That is why 359 years after his death, Shakespeare is still living.
He, in a peculiar sense, held the mirror up to Nature, and by being true to himself and to his time—one of the most difficult things for an ambitious man to do—he created living figures in dramatic verse which are true for all time, and promise to live as long as theatres are allowed to remain open.

THE PERFECT DAY.

THIS SEEMS to me a perfect day, a day beyond compare, although the skies are bleak and gray, and dank and raw the air; for I have got a volume gay, a pipe, an easy chair.
The water falls with ghostly thud upon the window pane; I see men toiling in the mud and cussing as they strain; the rivulet's become a flood, a wide morass the plain. The rooster is too tired to crow, and will be till he's dry; the seasick cattle sadly low, their backs humped three feet high; the landscape is a scene of woe, beneath a weeping sky. But I have found a gorgeous book that tells of blooming maids, of noble knights in arms who cook men's geese in sylvan glades, who cry "odfish" and eke "gadzook," and ply their gleaming blades. And all the sordid things of earth have vanished from my ken; I'm joining in the minstrel's mirth, I'm in the wizard's den, I walk with dames of queenly birth, and list to fighting men. So let the rain roll down the eaves, he should have stayed at home, and read a tale of warlike thieves of helm and halidome. So let the rain be charged with hail, the hailstones large as plums; I'm reading now a mighty tale of scraps and beating drums; I care no hoot for calm or gale, or for whatever comes.
