Ladies are participating in the IWW, hellraising now underway. This is as it should be. More of the fair sex ought to be running around with a fantastical gleam in their eyes, and the breakfast dishes unwashed.

$1 gasoline as predicted, ought to make the world interesting, as a high percentage of the addicts cannot get half enough to eat and wear at the present modest prices.

Business was not exactly bustling
the past week. In fact the only bustle observable was among the ladies.—

Hunger and plague are to play their

MORE, IF WE KEEP ON
Raisin Day

Eat More Fruit Month,
Thrill Year.

Dear Charlotte:

I told you I was planning to spend
One Day a Week with May. I left on Packer's Tar Soap day and motored down, reaching there on the afternoon
of Talcum Day, Toilet Preparations Month. We ran into only one storm
on Ribbon Dentifrice Day—and Tal-cum morning broke clear and cool. I was glad, because first impressions are apt to be lasting. I shall never forget Kettle Day of Kitchen Week
when I first visited Louise. How it rained!

Mary was as sweet as she could be.
She gave a delightful luncheon for me
on Fig Day, a bridge party on Apple
Day, Golf and dinner at the Country Club on Canned Peach Day, and a pretty little dance on the evening of Preserved Pear Day. I met a charming man, Peter Dolliver, and he gave us
all a delightful luncheon at his club on Apricot Day. So you see I had a busy Preserved Fruit Week.

The Portland ball team has won so many games, the thinking people are beginning to suspect the umpires.

There was a musical comedy at the Page last night. The front row looked like a conference of leading citizens.

A WELL MERITED REBUKE
(Albany Herald)

We don't mind these midnight
pet parties that Albany people are so fond of holding in our lane at Millersburg, but when they plank their cars in the middle of the drive so our humble flivver can't get us home, we object. There are enough county roads to go around. When using our lane for these purposes, kindly pull off into the ditch, and we'll help push
you out when you're ready.

WILL THERE BE AN OIL WAR?

THE ANNOUNCEMENT of a gasoline war in the United States following the signing of the Chester oil agreement at Angora yesterday is interesting. It may even mean that a movement has been started to consolidate—by force if necessary—all oil interests in the United States under one operating control, so that this country may present a united front in the inevitable struggle for oil control of the world.

The Chester Oil agreement with Turkey was made over the protests of both France and England. It means that Turkey prefers to grant oil concessions to a country which is not selfishly interested in gaining political advantages and territorial concessions in the near east.

This agreement marks the first real victory for the United States in the race for the oil supremacy of the world. Three years ago Secretary Hughes tried to secure the open door in the so-called Jambhi concessions in the East Indies, but failed. The concession went to the Dutch Shell.

Following this defeat the fight narrowed down to the American interests headed by the Standard, the British interests or the Anglo-Persian group and the Dutch Shell, backed by the Jewish bankers of Europe. The actual control, however, rested today with Great Britain, so that the real contest is between Uncle Sam and John Bull.

Here obviously is a situation fraught with grave danger, a situation which with the growth of economic nationalism, holds all the elements of another war. Fortunately, however, the economic conflict is between Great Britain and the United States, two kindred nations, between whom war is at least improbable.

There is, therefore, good reason to believe the problem will be satisfactorily solved eventually and some peaceful working agreement arrived at perhaps through the medium of the world court. This hope is particularly justified by the settlement of the controversy in 1920, which scarcely received the public attention its seriousness justified.

There was a decidedly acrimonious exchange of notes at that time between the Secretary of State Hughes and the British Foreign Office, between Secretary Fall and the British minister, but Sir John Cadman, head of the British Petroleum industry, entered the breach, and by his tact, sincerity and courtesy any acute difference was avoided and discussions were started in London looking toward the entrance of an American group of oil companies into participation with the British.

The result of these conversations have, as far as we know, never been announced, but it suggests at least that while England publicly opposes the Chester concession, there are plans under consideration which will not only spare her any serious sacrifice, but will lead finally to an oil-entente between Great Britain and the United States.

Greatness is three parts vision, two parts industry, and five parts headlines.

The funniest thing about us is that we always cheer loudest when the orator tells us we are a great people.

How real they are, these sermons by radio. Close your eyes, and you can't tell whether that funny noise is static or a snore.

The dictionary pronounces it "vodville," with a long "o," but those who patronize it usually pronounce it rotten.

At times we fear the human race will be destroyed; and then we see a man who thinks he is pretty, and we don't care if it is.

CONTENTED.

GROECR GRIGGS is never bitter, Groecr Briggs is never sore, and I hear him chirp and twitter as he labors in his store. Sometimes when the boys assemble in the grocer's store by night, they with indignation tremble, each one telling of his plight. This one fortune made a tinker when he should have held renown as a great and leading thinker, in his college cap and gown. That one fate has made a spinner, knowing in his inmost heart that he would have been a winner in the higher realm of Art. Each one finds himself pursuing tasks that make him tired and sad; each would swap the chore he's doing for the job of t'other lad. But the grocer sings and whistles, and he warbles cheery trines, as he wraps up figs and thistles, as he sells his homeless prunes. "All my life I've fed the masses," he remarks, with chortles five, "selling codfish and molasses that the people may survive. I have fed at least a million, adding to their souls' content, fed the soldier and civilian, fed the lady and the gent. Is there any job that's finer, is there any nobler task? I would be a piking whiner if I grumbled at my task." Ah, we feel like tinker-horn varmints when the grocer's spiel is o'er, and we gather up our garments and go sneaking from the store.

Local Thrift Shop Needs Articles

The Thrift Shop is a very interesting department of the Red Cross. It is a clearing ground for the discarded garments, furniture and dishes, etc., for the whole county, where any kind of an article that has served its days of usefulness in one home may be brought and then placed in other homes to continue their days of service, where they are needed badly and many of these same homes would have to be deprived of these necessities and comforts were it not for the existence and activities of the Thrift Shop.

The stock of the Thrift Shop is made up entirely of donations of any kind of article, nothing excepted. These articles leave the Thrift Shop in three different ways; first, by donations to those who are absolutely down and out. When one of these articles is referred to the executive secretary who investigates their case and upon her recommendation the needed articles are given. This does away with that promiscuous right and left giving which is so harmful. A record is kept of all such cases and help given in whatever way is needed.

The second way which goods go out of the shop is by women coming in the shop and working out the value of the goods they need. There are many families who can manage the items of food and rent, but who have no cash left with which to go to the stores and buy new clothes.

They are paid in garments at so much per hour, a nominal price is put on goods, a record is kept of their time, and they then earn these articles by cleaning, pressing, ripping, sewing, etc., and more than glad are they of the chance to be independent. These same people would rather go without than beg, so you good people who send bundles to the Thrift Shop little know how much good that bundle is going to do. Everything leaves the shop perfectly clean so there is no danger of contagion.

The third way goods go out of the shop is for cash, a small sum being charged to those who can pay it. Quite a number of housekeepers who did not have their bundles ready at the time of the spring drive in March are bringing them in now and others have promised theirs later and they are very gratefully received as we cannot begin to supply all the demands made upon the shop, especially in men's clothing.

You who have bundles, please do not wait for a special invitation, but call up the Red Cross in the Sparta building and it will be called for. If you are in doubt as to what to send, make a visit to the Thrift Shop if possible, and there you will see that every scrap is utilized and what is not usable as it is, is made over into practical garments. We even have people on the waiting list for rags.

This is a county institution and we wish the whole county to be interested. Several small towns have had drives for garments this spring and we hope in time to reach every part of the county.
