The public market was sold out much earlier than usual this morning, perhaps due to the fact that the busy housewives of the city realized that an ample supply of fresh vegetables on hand would all be sold if they came late. The supply of cherries did not nearly fill the demand for that fruit, but of all else the supply was plentiful.

had spent a lot of money on it. If there was anything irregular I would have to be well paid for it.

The next testimony dealt with Billy's sickness.

Told to Sit Tight. "About two weeks later Billy was taken sick and he told me about it and said to sit tight. I did not hear from him again until after Billy died and he telephoned me about it."

Falman's testimony that Shepherd had obtained germs from Falman's school, said that in response to Shepherd's questions he told him he had three tubes of typhoid cultures. Shepherd said he would need some typhoid cultures, Falman testified, and was told he could have them, as Falman could obtain more at the health department laboratory.

Shepherd then expressed a desire to learn about a course in bacteriology, according to Falman, but said he was too busy at that time to take it. Criminal phases of bacteriology were gone into, Shepherd asking Falman if he had known of any cases in which bacteria were used as criminal means.

Shepherd and Falman talked of tuberculosis germs, Falman testified, and Falman told the defendant that such germs could be carried for life without the person being noticeably affected.

How bacteria entered the body in food, water and respiration were explained to Shepherd at his request, Falman testified, and in response to Shepherd's questioning he said he explained how typhoid could be detected. This, he said, was difficult in its early stages. Diphtheria bacilli were also discussed. Negotiations with Shepherd extended over several months, Falman asserted.

He said he told Shepherd how to keep cultures alive.

Told About Billy. Shepherd said he had an adopted son, Billy, worth one or two million dollars, continued Falman, and that he had arranged Billy's will and could do practically as he wished with it.

"I asked him if Billy ran around much," Falman testified. "He told me that he did not, that he was engaged to Miss Pope, and I asked him if he knew when they were going to get married, and he said he expected they would get married at any time, and I told him that that would leave him out in the cold on the will proposition."

"He said that he didn't know exactly how that would affect him, but he didn't think it would be favorable, and I told him he ought to make some arrangements of some kind to take care of himself after the boy leaves after he becomes of age and is married, and he told me that he had his mind on something and he could figure things out all right for himself."

Shepherd said he was too busy at that time to go into work at Falman's school, Falman continued.

About the middle of October Shepherd told him, testified Falman, that his plans were arranged to prepare the typhoid cultures and put them in some water. Falman said he advised this as a good way to be sure of infection and that he explained to Shepherd how the bacteria would work by eating arteries or perforating intestines and producing death.

Compromised on $100,000. Two weeks later, said Falman, Shepherd came to his school and took a letter from the files which he had written to the school. After Falman's protesting, he paid him $50 for it.

"I told him it ought to be rather a couple of hundred ($200) anyhow, but Shepherd said that was too much money, so we compromised on $100,000 for me if everything developed all right. I asked him how long it would take to find out about those things and he said it would not take more than three or four months for him to get the money."

It was later testified Falman, that Shepherd seemed to think things were going all right, the boy had taken sick and was "very sick."

"I asked him if he had gotten a doctor for him and he said he had Dr. Stelp. I asked him about the treatment and he said he just gave him some cathartics."

The next meeting was after the boy's death.

"Then these things came out in the paper and he called up, and I told him I was getting kind of scared and I asked him if any of the servants around there knew about it. It scared a lot of people knew about the case and he said that they did not know about it and there was nothing to worry about, everything would be all right."

"Is that all?" asked Judge Lynch. "Yes."

"All right, cross examine for the state," directed the court.

Lawyers Have a Row. Yesterday witness Marchand admitted he had been receiving $50 a week from the state while in custody of the state's attorney at a downtown hotel since last March, more than he had earned under Falman. He also admitted that he had remarked that recovery of a letter such as he said Shepherd had written inquiring about a course in criminal bacteriology was worth $100,000, but denied that he had contemplated any such sale.

"Do you use dope?" O'Brien suddenly shot at Marchand. "Do I look like it?" Marchand came back.

"Yes," returned O'Brien. "You were instrumental in getting Falman to identify Shepherd?" asked O'Brien.

"Yes," replied Marchand. Marchand admitted that Falman never had informed him that he had seen Shepherd.

Marchand testified his correct name was McCann, but that he would have to change it after this trial.

"Why?" roared O'Brien. "You've just said I was a hop-head and it will be published in every paper in the country," replied Marchand.

Prosecutor Crowe objected and engaged in some quibbling with O'Brien. The latter appealed for Crowe's censure for "misconduct," and Judge Lynch ordered the prosecution's remarks stricken from the record.

Marchand said he changed his name from McCann at the request of his wife.

"All right, that's all, Marchand, march on," said O'Brien in dismissing the witness.

Prosecutor Crowe objected to the frivolous dismissal and the "march on" was stricken from the record.
