BRINGING UP FATHER

EVOLUTION TRIAL HAS CHANGED DISPOSITION OF JOHN T. SCOPES

By Clark Kinnaird.
Central Press Correspondent.

DAYTON, Tenn., July 15. — John Thomas Scopes is sick of it all. He wishes the trial was over. He is tired of the role of martyr. Each day adds to his discomfort. Reporters, often called stony hearted, are beginning to pity him. Sometimes Scopes must envy men on trial for murder. When court adjourns they have a nice, lonely cell to go back to and solitude in which to bathe their souls and carves. Scopes is free to go where he likes. But there is no place he can go for peace. He wanders in the streets, stared at or pursued.

JOHN T SCOPES

His temper is short. His attorneys appear to be vexed with him at times. Naturally, all this excitement has changed him in some respects. He is accused of being "up stage." This is not true. In spite of these changes, he still is John Thomas Scopes, high school teacher uncomfortably playing a role quite beyond his histronic capabilities.

Lives in Meager Quarters.

He lives in the Bailey boarding house, in Market street, two blocks from the courthouse. He rented the room when he came to Dayton in late August, 1924, fresh from a university. It is on the second floor and its triple-framed window looks out through the oak and maples at the courthouse tower. The room contains an iron bed, a washstand and his trunk. He keeps his clothes in a closet. The closet is in disarray. There is no table in the room. There was one, but he told his landlady that she could put it in another room, for someone else might need it more. He reads his now voluminous mail sitting on the bed, which sinks down a foot or more with the weight of his body, and puts his body in an uncomfortable position. No books are in sight in the room.

The bathroom is on the first floor and likely as not, when he comes out after his morning dousing, he finds reporters, barring his way to the stairway. Te objects to the intrusion. Later the same reporters meet him on the street and he speaks to them as pleasantly as he speaks to anyone else.

Is Popular in Town.

John T. Scopes hasn't had a "regular girl" in Dayton. In the last two months he has been seen frequently with Mildred Taylor, a pretty little girl who is employed in the W. A. Ault department store. All of the girls like him. In fact, everybody in town does, particularly his former students. They "swear by him."

He is big and blonde and 24 years old. He has abandoned his horn-rimmed spectacles since his pictures began to flash into the first pages of the country.

He came to Dayton as teacher in elemental sciences, including biology, in the Rhea Central high school. He coached the football team last fall and is given credit for its unparalleled success. Football is one of his loves. He was not a gridiron star at the University of Kentucky, his alma mater, however.

Scopes is putting Dayton on the map. But it is doubtful if Scopes will be a teacher in Dayton's high school next year. He isn't in the list of teachers selected for the high school, although no successor has been named for his place. Superintendent of Schools Walter White says there will never again be a school teacher in Rhea county who does not believe in every single word in the Bible literally.

Scopes is weary of his role, yet, when it is all over, he will miss the spotlight. Even now he is a little resentful of the tendency to push him in the background.

The "noble red man" of early American history was the origina "Major Ozone." Tuberculosis was not then his foe.
