

NEAR EAST RELIEF WILL BE FINISHED IN 3 OR 4 YEARS

"Think of children when you see the words 'Near East Relief,'" urges Rev. M. B. Paroungian, and Rev. A. B. Jones of Portland, Relief representatives of Near East Relief, speaking in Medford churches yesterday. "Not only are they children, but they are orphan children, made orphans by the world war and by the Turco-Greek war which stopped only three years ago. Add to this the fact that they are orphan children in strange hands with no responsible government to care for them and you will see why they make such a tremendous appeal to America. "They are children of our allies in the war, whose fathers and in some cases their mothers served in allied trenches. So valiantly did they fight that they are protected by the priceless oil fields from the central powers and weakened the submarine warfare, immeasurably hastening the end of the war by months. Boys are at home in Pacific county today who would be sleeping their long sleep in France had it not been for the work of these Armenian soldiers. "They are children related to us by ties of religion. They are children of the oldest Christian church in the world. When our ancestors, the bloodthirsty Angles and Saxons were so barbarous that no missionary dared go to preach to them, Armenia was civilized and Christianized and kept the torch of Christianity in the world until someone dared go to them with the gospel. "We dare not think of withdrawing yet, for to do so would undo the work of years and send children out totally unprepared for life. If we can continue their care a few more years we can send out thousands of youngsters to be a blessing to the world and youth who will love America as they would have loved their own parents whose place we have taken. Our only fear now is that we may not be able to keep the children until they are able to do for themselves. "The training given the children, consists of education, especially in manual arts, carpentry, blacksmithing, farmers, shoemakers, while the girls are trained as homemakers, nurses and teachers. "In three or four years our task will be finished," predicted Paroungian, "and one of the most remarkable, unselfish enterprises ever undertaken by a people will be ended."

KNIGHT CATSUP, MADE HERE, GETS WRITEUP IN VOLT

A publicity item on the Knight Packing company of this city and its famous Rogue River catsup is featured in this month's issue of The Volt. This is another example of the aggressive spirit of the California Oregon Power company in advertising the outstanding industries of this territory at every possible opportunity and it is expected that much good will result from this excellent publicity. The somewhat commonplace subject of manufacturing tomato catsup is treated in a very interesting and entertaining manner, bringing out a number of facts which will be a revelation to the average reader. The article is illustrated by a number of good photographs showing interior and exterior views of the Knight Packing plant of this city and local fields of Rogue River tomatoes. "Close up" of the large luscious fruit which is grown so successfully here, presents conclusive evidence that this is in truth an ideal country for tomato culture. It will probably be news to many local people to learn that the Medford packing plant can handle 35 tons of tomatoes daily, which will make 2750 gallons of catsup. The process of making the catsup is related by The Volt as follows: From the fields the tomatoes are delivered at the plant, there washed by immersion, then dipped from the tank in a net onto an endless belt. As it passes hand operators trim the fruit and remove anything that looks like a defect. The tomatoes then pass through a cleansing spray of water, then through steam, after which they drop from the belt to the chopping machine. Skins and seeds work out through the chopper as waste, and the fruit juice and pulp is diverted into kettles. Onions, garlic and spices are added during the cooking, and the finishing machine eliminates any seeds or pulp that may still remain. This is the base which becomes finished catsup when vinegar, salt and sugar have been added. Concerning the Knight Packing company and how it came to choose this valley in preference to all other locations, the following interesting information is quoted from the columns of The Volt: "The Knight Packing company makes the Rogue River catsup. Frank L. Knight, from whom the organization gets its name, started in the pickle and vinegar business more than a quarter of a century ago in Portland, but has not been engaged in manufacturing catsup all the time since elapsed. It was in the summer of 1918, after two years spent in studying catsup manufacturing methods at various points throughout the United States, buying machinery, getting recipes, and investigating tomato growing districts, he built his plant at Medford, Oregon. "The selection of this plant location was largely influenced through the recommendation of the Oregon Agricultural College. Its agricultural expert points out—and Mr. Knight found it to be the case—that the Rogue River valley produces a tomato that is particularly adapted to catsup manufacture. Also the sunny days and absence of rain during the growing season ripens the tomato to that rich red color and delicious flavor so desirable in catsup. This absence of rainfall holds down the bacteria content to the minimum. Because of this the Knight Packing company has to date been able to make a catsup that shows no mold whatever. "Details of this activity, and significant side remarks bearing on it, follow. They are part of the information supplied by R. R. McKean, sales manager for the Knight Packing company, in answer to our request: "Tell us about Rogue River catsup. "Our recipe," said Mr. McKean, "is a combination of the best information we were able to buy with the results of our endless experiments. And in our plant we installed the best machinery on the market because to make good catsup you must have good equipment. "One reason for locating our plant in the heart of the tomato growing district is that it enables us to turn the fruit into catsup within a few hours after it is picked. That is a mighty important factor in making high grade catsup. "Our catsup business has grown. From nothing it has developed in less than eight years so that we are contenders of importance in the market to which we limit ourselves at present. In the city of Portland we have a 75 per cent distribution in the grocery stores. Practically all of the best hotels and restaurants in Portland serve Rogue River catsup. We also have a good distribution throughout Oregon and in part of Washington. With varying degrees of success we have succeeded in placing our catsup in California, Idaho and eastern Washington. We anticipate far greater distribution in time to come. "We thought so well of the valley from where our tomatoes come that we copyrighted the name 'Rogue River' as applied to tomato catsup, tomato chili sauce an dtomato puree. "Our first aim has been to make a catsup of high quality, and to maintain that standard always. We feel that we have succeeded in this, and any business we have failed to get has not been held from us because of any lack of quality. "Knight's catsup is an Oregon product, the only catsup manufactured in the state, and the only high grade bottled catsup manufactured in the Pacific northwest. We still cling to the 16-ounce full pint bottle in face of the fact that eastern manufacturers are adopting the 14-ounce short measure bottle. "With quality, quantity and advertising, an old home product, it seems that we have everything to make Knight's Rogue River Tomato catsup the leader in its field. "Supplementing the above quoted remarks, The Volt can add that such a plant is this is a big asset from a community standpoint. Not only does it contribute to pay roll, but also provides a local market for a fruit crop specially adapted to the Rogue River valley." Medford Ministers Meet Tuesday. EVACUATION OF COLOGNE AREA EXPECTED SOON

PARIS, Oct. 19.—(A. P.)—Evacuation of the Cologne bridgehead now held by British troops is expected to result from the agreement in the security pact although it is said in French official circles today that no promise, verbal or written, has been made to that effect. Foreign Secretary Chamberlain of Great Britain and French Foreign Minister Briand who returned today from Locarno were discussing Premier Painleve the question of re-allocating the territory in the Rhine-land between the forces of the allied powers after the evacuation of Cologne. This was taken to mean that the bridgehead would be returned to the Germans within a few weeks. Renewal of German co-operation in the administration of the occupied territory is being considered by the allies. The desire of the latter is, it is said, in official circles, to give the Germans every satisfaction possible in the administration of German territory on the left bank of the Rhine.

RADIO NEWS

CHICAGO, Oct. 19.—(A. P.)—Elimination of atmosphere and interference caused by the Man-made static, has been furthered within the last year or so through additional experiments with underground antenna for radio reception. Several types of buried aerials have been designed with more or less success. Experiments conducted over a number of years by several of the country's prominent radio men have developed that while an underground antenna does cut down interference including that caused by some of the electrical inventions of man, there is a drop in volume. In addition it has been found that the directional qualities of such a pickup system are more marked than with an antenna strung above the ground. Attempts are being made, however, to overcome these difficulties and a Chicago experimenter recently announced he had improved the underground system to the point where many of the problems heretofore encountered have been overcome. The underground "aerial" consists of a buried wire which has been carefully insulated so as to exclude dampness. Some times this wire is buried in the form of a spiral and at others it is laid in a long trench. Great success has attended the system when the insulated wire is encased in a metal shield, which, of course is grounded, giving what is known as a condenser aerial. This shield tends to keep from the receiver a large part of the static and other interference, permitting clearer reception and at times louder signals. Care is taken that this shield covers the wire up to the receiver.
