Wedding Bells

It is no longer safe for reporters in a hurry to linger long in Judge Taylor's court in the federal building, unless they have a hankering for kissing brides and acting as witnesses at marriage ceremonies of out-of-town love-lorn couples.

A reporter just started to leave the courtroom this forenoon when a young trio, two women and a man, entered. "Just a moment, please," called out Judge Taylor, who can spot an unmarried couple a block away, to the fleeing newspaper man, and then remarked to the newcomers, "You want to get married, I presume." "Yes," was the eager reply of two of the trio.

Then with the newsgatherer and Mrs. Isabel Doll, sister of one of the contracting parties as witnesses, the judge united in marriage Leona F. Nightwine and Elwyn F. Pierson, who gave their addresses as Portland. When told about the presence of a reporter, the prospective bride and groom gasped with dismay and exclaimed, "We didn't want it known yet for a while."

"From California?" queried the reporter.

"No, Multnomah county, but we really didn't want it to become public yet. No elopement or that sort of thing, but we would rather keep the news of our wedding from reaching home for several days at least."

When told that it would probably take a couple of days after the wedding here for the news to percolate through to Portland, the couple seemed somewhat reassured. They and Mrs. Doll left for the south after the wedding.
