Her parents were inclined to place little credence in a report to the police by Caroline Neveday, who described herself as a friend of Miss Drew, that the student had told her of a suicide pact with a novelist, but they asked a full investigation.

It was determined that Miss Drew had called on Maxwell Bodenheim, author of "Replenishing Genesis," Sunday night. She was not seen again until her body was found yesterday.

VERNON, B. C., July 20.—(AP)—A report by a patrol of girl guides that they saw a mysterious monster disporting itself in Okanagan lake has led a few persons to believe in a reappearance of the "ogopogo," but a great many more to conclude that the girl guides' evidence of keep out of the sun on hot days or both.

The ogopogo has been reported before, always in the hottest weather, but whether it is the sun that causes the monster to rise to visibility from the depths of the lake or whether it merely causes sun-baked eyes to see something that isn't there is an open question.

The girls of the Robin patrol, with Miss L. Price, girl guide nurse, were spending the day on the shore of Otter bay, the water being as calm as that glassy surface through which appeared in the legend of King Arthur's death, the mysterious arm clad in white samite.

Suddenly a "long creature," about 45 feet long, the girls estimated, rushed across the water of the bay with an undulating motion that made "quite a noise."

An accurate description of the animal was not obtained.
