Experiments Reveal Well-Treated Soils May Never Wear Out

To the soil scientist there is no such thing as "worn out" land, a popular theory that is blamed for much of the farm abandonment in this country. Above is an experimental wheat field at Rothamsted, England, showing the 18th consecutive crop, shoulder high and yielding 35 bushels to the acre. At the right, below, is the 14th consecutive crop of wheat at Pennsylvania State College, averaging 23 bushels to the acre, as compared, at the left, with 12 bushels to the acre where soil requirements have been neglected.

WASHINGTON, D. C. — (AP) — Thirty million acres of idle crop land, much of it abandoned on the theory that it is "worn out," some day will be brought back to active production, soil scientists say. It is their contention that, except in the popular conception, land does not wear out and that with intelligent management a field may be needed in the same crop each consecutive year indefinitely without diminishing the yield.

The most notable example is recorded at Rothamsted experimental station in England, where the 86th consecutive crop of wheat was produced this year on the same land. The average yield for the entire period has been 35 bushels to the acre, maintained, officials say, by returning to the soil the same elements of plant food in the same quantity they were taken up by each crop.

The experiment, oldest of its kind in the world, was started in 1843, when the station was founded by Sir John Lawes, the originator of commercial fertilizer. England had an exceptionally good growing season this year and the wheat at Rothamsted stood shoulder high at cutting.

Of more significance to American agriculture, the 18th consecutive crop of wheat on the same land was produced this year at Pennsylvania State College. To the United States, what the Rothamsted test is to England, the action pictures of the Medford football team in games against Corvallis, Chemawa Indian school and other teams are attracting considerable attention in the display case of the U. Verne Shingle studio on North Central avenue.

And even the new screen in the picture are coming from the stage instead of the department store. The latest discovery of William Fox, for instance, is Marguerite Churchill, who was invited to Hollywood because she showed promise on the New York stage. And newcomers in other studios are beginning to show the same trend.

Merging Personalities. Film folk, on the other hand, are rushing to the stages of legitimate theaters hereabouts to mold their silent screen personalities into personalities with audible appeal. This play billboards look like a directory of stinging celebrities. And producers, far from casting aside the non-stage-trained youngsters they discovered in last year's search for youth and beauty, are organizing schools of their own to teach the boys and girls how to talk as they would have been able to talk in the first place had they come from the stage.

Screen Life in Hollywood. By Wade Werner. HOLLYWOOD, Cal. — Mergers are the mode of the moment. Whether in motors or movies, the next development always seems to be another merger. So it may be wondered if only natural to wonder if all the excitement over talking pictures isn't after all, just the preliminary phase of one more merger—the merger of stage and screen.

Whether it is the screen that is absorbing the stage, or the stage that is getting ready to take over the screen is something else to argue about. But anyone standing on the sidelines here can see an unmistakable such of stage talent toward the talking screen, and an equally unmistakable stampede of screen talent toward the stage.
