SAN FRANCISCO MARKET RISES OVER SHIPS' TOMBS

Montgomery street, San Francisco (above), is the site of the west's largest market for money and securities. The buildings are erected over the long-buried hulks of wrecked vessels and other sea debris cast up on the changing shore line of San Francisco bay many years ago.

By W. A. Wells, (Associated Press Feature Editor.) SAN FRANCISCO, (AP)—Finance, heading not the biblical advice about building houses on sand, has reared the west's largest money and security mart along Montgomery street, since the shifting shore line of San Francisco bay.

This western Wall street grew from a crooked lane, parts of which were lapped at high tide by the waters which poured in through the Golden Gate and, when the tide was out, faced a bleak expanse of mud flats and sand. Derelict ships' old hulks and the flotsam and jelsam of the sea washed in upon it, and none ever went to the trouble of removing the debris.

As the need for more room, due to building congestion, forced the waterfront back, block by block, the old wreckage was covered over. Upon this old silted graveyard much of the city's financial district now stands. Excavators, going deeper and deeper for foundations to support the ever-increasing height of buildings encounter there old hulks and here and there a plaque has been placed to designate the final resting place of some famous ship.
