HOUND OF SILMAN, WILD DOG LEADER, QUILTS NIGHT LIFE

MERCED, Cal., Jan. 28.—(AP)—A ferocious dog, leader of a huge pack of hounds and coyotes in nocturnal raids on livestock, had vanished today after a shotgun and pistol had slain half his followers.

"Hound of Silman," named from the ranch where he made his first raid on cattle, was believed to have retreated to his lair with his hungry pack.

Many cattle have been killed by the "Hound of Silman" and his predatory horde. The big wolf dog had recruited many dogs and coyotes and for many nights the mad band made raids on ranches.

Cattlemen in this section were forced to band together with guns and patrol their lands nightly. One night the posse sighted a pack of nearly 50 dogs roaming over the wastes, with the "Hound of Silman" at their head. The posse opened fire and killed 20 dogs, the others escaping.

Poison was placed in the carcasses of slain cattle and several of the wild dogs were found dead the next day.

A theory that the "Hound of Silman" and other dogs were kept on the ranch of a man who turned the beasts loose nightly to ravage neighboring farms was being investigated by E. V. Sande, state predatory animal supervisor.

Woman Traveler Saw Modern Leaven Work in Afghan's Capital

Miss Jeanne Van Cover (above), world-traveler of Washington, has an especially keen interest in Afghanistan's revolt over modern innovations for, she says, she is the first American woman ever to penetrate to this remote kingdom. She met the Amir and his queen (below).

WASHINGTON—(AP)—Afghanistan, remote Asiatic mountain kingdom now torn by revolt against its king's western innovations and the movement of the queen against the seclusion of women, was found to be a land backward in civilization when Miss Jeanne Van Cover visited it a few years ago.

Miss Van Cover believes that she is the first American woman ever to enter this inaccessible and formerly inhospitable land. A taste for travel and adventure that had carried her to many remote places impelled her to leave India, alone except for two native guides, and journey across the Khyber Pass, on through the wild frontier country, to Kabul, the Afghan capital.

"The women, being Mohammedans, are strictly secluded and veiled," Miss Van Cover says. "No male over 12 years of age, except a very near relative, is allowed to see Afghan women of the higher classes dressed. Being a woman, however, I had the advantage of being admitted to their homes and seeing something of their intimate life."

She found women whom she met intensely interested in her various adventures. Among them was the wife of Nadir Khan, a leader and, at that time, minister of war.

Miss Van Cover relates how she was presented to the Amir and his queen. She remembers him an almost boyish in his enthusiasm over some of his plans for the future.

Miss Van Cover was invited to attend the laying of the cornerstone of a public building in the new capital being constructed on the heights, five miles from Kabul, and known as Dar-ul-Amn or "place of peace."

"The ceremonies were over and I, delighted that this great dream of his had been brought thus far, was glowing with happiness. I was with the Russian ambassador and the Italian charge d'affaires in the former's automobile and we waited, before starting back to Kabul, until the Amir had left mounted on a magnificent black charger. But we soon passed him and his brilliant escort, and as he saw us, he smiled and waved his hand and a very boy in the joy of the day.

I was interested in everything I saw in Afghanistan, but, as a woman, was especially so in the educational work being done for girls. Formerly a girl might be taught to read the Koran. If her father were interested in having her do so, but not to write, for, if she could write, she might communicate with some lover outside the garden walls who might hold enough to have the consequences of being caught by male members of the family.

"Fifty or six years ago, however, a school was started in Kabul for girls under the patronage of the queen."

ring from which there is one narrow alley or exit. One of these canals is tied and the other left free in the ring. Then a female camel is led in and the untied canal is allowed to flow with her. The tied canals look on with growing jealousy and fury. When the latter has reached its fighting pitch of anger, the lady is led off, the female's rope is untied and she straightaway makes for his rival.

The camel's method of fighting is to try to get his humps beneath his opponent and then to toss the latter over on his back. They do not always fight to the death. The cause which leads to it is getting the wind on it often blows from the ring down the hole which is left open for the purpose, the one who remains on the field being then proclaimed victor.

SHIPS OF DESERT BATTLE IN ARENA FOR PLANES FUND

STAMBOUL, Turkey, Jan. 28.—(AP)—Eight camels, lords of a race that is fast dying out of Turkey beneath the pressure of modern civilization, are to meet in the stadium of Stamboul, there to lay down their lives or at least sustain their humps so that more airplanes may sweep through Turkish skies over ancient abandoned caravan trails.

The Turkish National Aviation league is to stage the camel combat, the proceeds of which will go to well the millions of lira already raised in various ways for the purchase of the republic's planes.

Camel fighting is a sport as dear to Anatolians as bullfights to the Spaniard, but this will be the first camel combat held in the metropolis within the memory of the oldest inhabitant. To stage a fight between these stately ships of the desert the cue is to be to provide a woman in the ring. Two gentlemen camels are led to the
