A clever ruse laid west by a youth "took in" several Ashland residents and business men, who learned after the boy had gone that his story was a pure invention. He had claimed his mother had died just two months ago and he was on route to southern California when he collapsed while walking up the Siskiyou mountains. He was found by state highway employees and brought to the Ashland hospital. On hearing his story that he was an orphan and was still suffering from grief, he received free hospital care, new shoes and cash, after which he left for the south. A letter was received Saturday by Clint Langham, fire chief, from the boy's mother, asking for his whereabouts.
