"THE HOME OF BREAD LIKE MOTHER MADE"

GOOD BREAD

It isn't what we put into our bread that gives it that fine flavor—it's what we leave out. With the growth of commercial baking it was only natural that laboratory experiments would eventually discover substitute ingredients that would reduce the cost of baking—so along came malt syrup and leavening agents containing sodium aluminum sulphate (a technical term for alum)—and that good old home flavor gradually disappeared from commercial or bakers' bread.

Here we leave the substitutes out—using only the ingredients you would use if baking at home—bake thoroughly as you would bake—and of course give you bread with that good old home flavor—which is possible in no other way—Come in tomorrow and get your Sunday supply.
