AIR OPERATORS TELL RADIO MEN OF APPARATUS

WASHINGTON.—(AP) The perfecting of apparatus for aircraft use has been one of the biggest problems in the entire field of radio design and development.

To assist the engineers in the work, air transport operators of the country, preparing to inaugurate extensive use of radio, have compiled a list of requirements for the development and manufacture of equipment.

The varying conditions under which operations are maintained at present call for three separate forms of power supply, the operators say. These are wind driven generators, engine driven generators and dynamos. The maximum supply from these so far as known is 1000 volts, supplying 500 milliamperes and 15 volts and 15 amperes on the low side. Voltage regulation of all these units shall be within plus or minus 2 per cent.

Microphones should be developed for both open and closed places. In the open plane, construction should be such that when in position the pilot can move about the cockpit freely, even projecting his head over the side, without leaving the microphone. Operation must be maintained when the pilot wears a mask and in extremely cold weather.

Light noise-excluding head sets, which can be worn for protracted periods without causing discomfort should be developed. While it is impractical to designate specific dimensions, all radio equipment and accessories should be as compact and light as is consistent with acceptable operation, the aircraft men point out.

The receiver should be of a unit control type adapted for either manual or remote control, using standard commercial vacuum tubes, and is to have an input level of ten microvolts giving an output of ten volts of 600 kilocycles. The transmitter should be so constructed that it has an operating range of 3 to 1 in wavelength.

It is emphasized that equipment must function during the maneuvering of the ship and through sudden jolts and all weather conditions such as heavy rain, sleet, snow and high wind. Temperature variations must be accommodated over wide ranges in short periods of time.

Steering Important to Car Operation

"Evidently motor car owners like the taste of good steering they are getting today. I can't help concluding that the case when I notice the number of car owners that come in here to have the mechanism checked when steering doesn't seem to be just right," says an expert mechanic.

"After all, every motorist should realize that good steering is only as good as it's maintained. In that way, it's like all other parts of the car. If it is allowed to follow its own course, it'll likely develop, first, a stiffness in turning, and second, a habit of transmitting road shocks, wheel movements, and other wobbling effects back into the driver's arms.

"Keepin' steerin' in good condition is a matter of knowin' what's likely to make it less good.

"There are eight possible troubles with the steerin' that should always be borne in mind. For one, and it's common, too little air pressure in the front tires will make the wheels harder to turn. Lack of lubrication will do the same thing. Poor wheel alignment tends to make the steerin' wheel fight back and it often is quite as bad in this respect as incontin' excessive tire wear.

"Wear in the thrust bearin' is one of the common causes of back lash. King pin bushin' wear is another source of steerin' annoyance that is particularly irritatin'.

"The condition of the wheel bearin' also is important. If they are adjusted too loosely, the wheel'll wobble and it will be transmitted back to the driver. Unequal adjustment of the brakes also needs to be watched by the man who demands a car that guides easily. So does looseness in the front springs.

"Bearin' these possible troubles in mind, the car owner should have little difficulty in locatin' just what is wrong."
