

NATIONAL NOTICE GAINED FOR CITY THROUGH AIRPORT

Medford, being cited by large eastern cities as an example of air-mindedness, is falling in for a wealth of valuable national publicity.

Having promptly fulfilled his request, Mr. Baker received the following letter from the Philadelphia headquarters this morning:

"Dear Mr. Baker: I very much appreciate your complete letter of May 13, with information about the airport of Medford. This is a very inspiring story, and should be a stimulating example to many other towns and cities of the United States.

"With best wishes.

'GENTLEMEN OF PRESS' ENTERTAINING TALKIE DETOURS USUAL PLOT

Although no big city official or political boss is exposed, no cub reporter wins laurels over the veteran reporters, no excited newsmen are seen running around in circles over some big story, nor are throbbing printing presses featured, the much-talked-of film play, "Gentlemen of the Press," which begins its Medford engagement Sunday at Hunt's Craterian theater, and which was given a private view late last night for the local newspaper folks, is a drama of much human interest and in its appeal and naturalness is probably the best of the newspaper screen plays seen here, at the much overexaggerated 10 places.

The novelty of the plot, which has a veteran, brainy and resourceful metropolitan reporter, who has graduated into a wild-eyed night city editor as its leading character, a sex triangle, in which he is involved by a new kind of vampire, who also tries to rope in the young reporter husband of his daughter, and the scenes set in the "city room" of a newspaper, with reporters and copy readers at work, and their hangouts when off duty, a hospital, a suite in a flat, and its humor and pathos holds listeners in tense interest throughout.

The dialogue, in its sound technique, is almost perfect, and above all "Gentlemen of the Press" is splendidly played by a nationally prominent cast of characters, in which Walter Huston, Katherine Francis, Betty Lawford and Charles Ruggles, as the "stewed" reporter, who furnished laughs throughout, have the leading parts. One scene, grossly exaggerated, purports to show a big business man dining and winning reports from various newspapers in hopes of gaining free publicity for a venture.

Despite this and a few other untrue and libelous characterizations against the newspaper fraternity as a whole, "Gentlemen of the Press" provides a charming and gripping entertainment, in metropolitan newspaper atmosphere, and teaches a moral in the reporter and editor who was so absorbed in the fascination of his work as to neglect his family life.

GOLD BULLETS by Charles G. Booth

SYNOPSIS: The "poker" game that cracked the town! Alex Peterson desperately trying to save his brother from the hangman's noose gambles with Joe Landy for a business life. Higher and higher they push the stakes—$100,000—$250,000—$500,000—then Landy makes his chancy proposal. He scribbles "Jerry Peterson goes free" and throws the slip on the table. Peterson covers with a transfer of the Two Brothers mine—they show their hands. Peterson has four queens—the ace is divided—only four kings or a straight flush can beat him—Landy shows a straight flush.

CHAPTER 29. Again—Marked Cards. Jerry felt silent. I found myself staring into his tragic eyes. I mumbled lamely, "Poor Andrew! I don't wonder at the change in him!" Jerry ran his hand gently over Landy's dark head and she drew closer to him, pressing her cheek against his knee. He then resumed, "The mind'll take in only so much, and at first Dad didn't get the full import of Landy's stratagem. Landy grinning up at him and beginning to draw in the pot drove the thing home. Himself bankrupted and Jerry as deep in the mess as ever."

"Landy began to laugh again. Dad said if he'd stayed within sound of it he'd have killed the man. Half the town had forced its way into the building. He rammed his way through them—they let him pass when they saw the look in his eyes. "Outside, he dropped on a bench for a minute—he'd always prided himself on being too shrewd to be taken in by so simple a trick as that—but he soon cooled down. Marie had slid back into the shadows. Dad revealed Marie had been stolen by Landy several years before and he supposed this was his revenge. "Dad thought for a space. Then he got up and moved towards the door, rolling a cigarette. Fitch raised his head. "That grinned at him. 'Landy updates still!'" which stood at one end of the veranda that fronted the building. He said he couldn't get away from Uncle Jerry's eyes. And in five hours it would be sun-up. "Fitch and Webb and Burke came out. They saw Dad and nodded to one another. Burke crossed the street, Webb lunched over to the rail at the other end of the veranda, and Fitch sat in the atop. "Dad couldn't go on like this—Jerry's precious five hours dribbling away. He said he had a feeling of defect somewhere. Something wrong. He began to grope around in his mind, but he couldn't get it. And all the time he was thinking of Uncle Jerry. There must be some way out.

Wretched, drunken miners were mulling, carousing, dancing, shooting.

"Landy's Place began to come to life again. Dad tried to shut his eyes against the din, but it grew louder and louder. Someone shouted, "Drinks on Joe Landy!" Fitch drinks meant that Landy was taking the easiest way of making himself solid with the miners. "Dad hadn't got rid of that sense of something wrong. There was something wrong. Of this he was positive. Something wrong with that game. Why couldn't he pin it down?"

"Someone was standing near him. He saw it was old Pat Ferie, a prospector. Ferie stuck his thumb in Dad's ribs. "What do you want?" Dad growled. "Landy cleaned you, huh? He chuckled so low that Dad scarcely heard him. "Dad told him to take himself off and mind his own affairs. Ferie he-he-he'd and stayed where he was. Thumbing Dad again, he nodded significantly towards Fitch and Webb. Something in his attitude cautioned Dad. "What's wrong with you?" he muttered. "Ferie he-he-he'd again. Landy cleaned you, Ten-to-one. I knowed he would! He's been layin' fer you an' now he's got you!" "Dad held his tongue with difficulty. "Landy's a slick hombre. Ferie ramblod on. 'Yes-yes!' An' so's old Pat Ferie! I ain't figured out yet hein' married to let Joe Landy make a fool of you. Ten-to-one, Vere a terrible disappointment to me!"

The racket inside was deafening by this. Dad said, and as Ferie had spoken scarcely a dozen words, Fitch couldn't possibly have heard him. "Out with it, desert rat!" Dad growled. "He-he-he!" Ferie chuckled. "Ten cards go played with—'" "Yes!" "They was marked—'" "They weren't! I looked."
