"The Desert Song" remains all the charm, color, action, romance and tragic love of the stage production, but greatly enhanced by the motion picture camera's power of motion. The desert scenes were made in a desert and not in front of painted backdrops. The desert castle of the Calid, with the splendors of its oriental architecture, would fill several stages. For the Love of a Lady by Jeffery Farnol

SYNOPSIS: Because beautiful Helen Darcy accused Sir Richard Guyford, a blackmailer of some years, the dashing young nobleman faces almost certain death in an impending trial. Entraged by Helen's accusation, Sir Richard seeks his revenge, and Julian, who has been using Richard's name, is named as a deadly swordsman. Chief among Helen's suitors are Captain Despard and Yacovet Brocklehurst, Julian's friends, but also victims of his avicious cunning. Helen, glancing at the captain, saw his persistent gaze was shifted from her at last. "Captain Despard," said she, "you are thinking, perhaps, that some whips break too readily." "I think, my lady, that broken whip doth surely presage battle—murder, and sudden death." "Ha, and is it a duel ye're meaning now?" inquired the Duchess. "Julian has challenged the fellow; the duel's good as arranged." "Oh, my dear souls," exclaimed the Duchess, "tis mighty comforting to us poor sinners to know of some one more sinful than ourselves. Sir Richard now—yonder he comes, I think, through the herb garden." The company rose instinctively. Sir Richard stood a little at a loss and staring at them, one and all, with his most sullen expression. Then the Duchess beckoned, whereupon he stepped forward, hat in hand; but as he advanced the company retreated. "So you are the ogre!" said the Duchess, looking up at him with her strangely beautiful eyes. "A pariah and outcast—eh, Sir Richard?" "Which nothing grieves me?" he answered, turning his back upon the company. "I am here, madam, in answer to your strangely urgent letter; pray how may I serve you?" "First by sitting down, sir. Oh, ye greatly resemble your father, sir. Shure he kissed me frequently long ago. 'Tis with the eyes of your mother you look at me—no dear, loved Barbara. She was me dearest friend—I knew her years ere she met your father." "I pray you tell me of her." "Not now, sir. You shall tell me of yours." "But he sat mute, scowling down his riding-boot. Then, looking into those strangely beautiful eyes, Sir Richard began to talk, as he had never done even to the faithful Gregory, speaking from his very heart. Thus, after the company having departed, Helen approached the shady cherry-tree. "Ah, Helen!" smiled the Duchess, "make your reverence to Sir Richard Guyford." "Nay, madam," sighed my lady, "we ha' met before. I broke into Sir Richard's house to steal a letter—a letter which may perchance explain how Sir Richard broke his whip." Sir Richard merely bowed. "Speak, miss—explain, child—this moment, ma'am, or I shall burst something." "There, there!" said Helen, taking madam's somewhat large hand and patting it. "Shait not burst, dear heart, no—here's the story. A year ago, Angela met a villain. A cold-hearted, calculating villain and the poor, sweet innocent scarce out o' the nursery! Well, she writes him foolish letters, and presently forgets both them and him. But, two months ago, she meets my lord Althorp and scarce is their betrothal announced than the villain reappears, threatening exposure of the letters. In London poor distracted Angela flies to me in her terror. I learn the villain is in Sussex, so to Sussex we come." "Indeed, my love. But scarce are we here, Angela writes the villain another letter, behind my back, a wild letter full of frantic supplications and then tells me I borrowed Betty's cloak, and crept to the villain's house, slipped through the villain's window and met the villain." "And who was the wretch?" "Sir Richard Guyford." (Copyright, 1928, Jeffery Farnol)

Richard gazed from the Duchess' glorious eyes to Helen's proud chin.

"Were they so outrageous drunk, Betty?" "Well, my lady, 'twas that wild some, Sir Richard Guyford—whips his poor, young gentleman-cousin shameful cruel—Mr. Julian." "And how didst learn o' this, Betty?" "Well, ma'am, every one's a-dissussing 't. There's Mrs. Weatherly below stairs, as lives at The Gables, ma'am, and Sir John Parret and his lady, and my lord Viscount Brocklehurst and Captain Despard all a-waiting to tell ye about it and settling in the garden with Ma dame." "The visitors were grouped about Madame la Duchesse d'Estouteville, a hook-nosed, sharp-chinned, formidable-seeming lady she, of very uncertain age, complexion too vividly red and white, but with glorious eyes, undimmed by years, of a won derful blue, deep and dark. As Helen approached the company rose, the ladies rushed delicately to kiss her, the gentlemen bowed, fluttered hat or handkerchief. "And now," said the Duchess, "you find as sitting in solemn judgment upon a monster and a villain and consequently 'tis dying I am to meet him!" "Him?" repeated Helen. "Himself, my dear, and his name is Richard Guyford. These kind friends, Helen, are come to warn us against the villain. F'r instance, Sir John Parret is an authority on the monster—eh, Sir John?" "True, madam!" quoth Sir John. "And also being a neighbor and a Justice of the Peace, I hold it my bounden duty to—hum—to advise you against this—" "Person!" suggested his lady, frowning. "Meaning Sir Richard Guyford?" inquired Helen. "The—ha—person in question, encourages poaching! He harbors vagrants, permits rascally gypsies to camp on his lands and this is viewed very much askance by the neighbouring gentry." "But is he not also a highway man?" inquired Helen; and the persistent gaze of Captain Despard, who smiled slightly, shaking his head. "And is he not forever drunk?" inquired Helen. "And quarrels," piped the Viscount. "Now if a gentleman quarrels, he should like a gentleman—but this fellow! There's poor Julian laughing one moment and the next—this fellow thrashing him most vilely with a whip and a
