New City Appears in Heart of New York

Has Full Size Streets, With Homes, Stores, Theatre and School—Also Aviation Field in Operation.

NEW YORK.—A city of light has suddenly appeared in the heart of New York. This city, which is officially known as the Westinghouse Lighting Institute, occupies the entire seventh floor of the Grand Central Palace building at 47th Street and Lexington Avenue. This permanent institute is for the advancement of the art of modern lighting and is contributed to the industry by the Westinghouse Lamp Company.

In this institute, the public will find Mazda Avenue, a full-sized street 180 feet long, and 20 feet wide, and Cross Street 85 feet in length. Both of these streets have all the characteristics of any city street. Here can be found everything to meet the business and social requirements of the average small town—a department store, bank, offices, and industrial buildings, florist and other shops, combination service and gas-filling station, school, modern home, art gallery, and theatre or auditorium large enough to seat many people. Mazda Avenue's unique lighting system will be used to demonstrate proper highway-lighting as this particular street can be lighted with different degrees of intensity. Traffic signals will also be demonstrated here.

Occupies City Block

When you stop to consider that this permanent exhibition occupies forty thousand square feet or an entire city block, some idea of the size can be visualized. It is to this gigantic permanent experimental laboratory that the scientists, engineers, architects, designers, and all others interested in electrical lighting problems, whether it be in their homes, offices or factories to the workers. It will also be a meeting place for students of technical schools and colleges, lighting engineers and public utility men, and also for the members of scientific and engineering organizations.

Ralph Neumuller Director

The institute will be under the direction of Ralph Neumuller, long recognized as one of the leaders in the electrical industry. His wide experience in the Public Utility field will enable him to make the institute of great value to the electrical industry and to the city and country as well.

One of the most interesting sections of the institute is the transportation room in which is located an aviation field. Here can be seen all the activities of an airport in full operation under day and night conditions. Every detail of illumination is shown here, from the elaborate floodlighting system to the illuminated wind-sack on the top of the hangar. This field is so arranged that it represents an area of 250 square miles. Here the aviator can work out all of his many problems for safe night flying.

Model School Room

In another section of the institute is found a model school room having accommodations for thirty-five people. Here is found what hardly exists today: that is, adequate lighting for the school room—namely, the proper illumination on black-board areas, together with a modern general and unit system of ventilation.

The art gallery of the institute has many unequalled methods of illumination. Here will be demonstrated a newly developed lens principle which permits the lighting equipment to be recessed on structural surfaces. This system allows the light to go to higher intensities and can be used in the operating rooms of a hospital where it is easily possible for a qualified surgeon to perform a major operation under the unglaring, high-intensity light demonstrated here, which functions without the least discomfort to the eyes of the surgeon or others in the room assisting him.

How good vegetables can be

if cooked in this appetizing way!

MANY men and many children seem to dislike certain vegetable dishes that everyone knows they should eat. That is why the recent work of a group of nationally known women cooking experts is so important. These women working on the problem of taste rediscovered an old secret—add a dash of sugar to vegetables while they are cooking. It makes more difference to the taste than anyone who has not tried it would believe.

No, it does not make the vegetables taste sweet. That must be clear. The little sugar acts as a developer of the tasteful flavors—the delicious flavors already in the foods. It also makes the vegetables seem fresher and it adds to their color. Experiment now with a little sugar in cooking every kind of vegetable and you will be amazed at the difference it makes.

A great variety of appetizing foods—that is the daily need of children and adults. Remember to use a little sugar as a flavorer for cereals, fruits, vegetables and milk desserts. Sugar, if used intelligently, can help everyone to eat and to enjoy variety. Think of sugar as a seasoning. Good food promotes good health. The Sugar Institute.
