SIMPLICITY AND SOPHISTICATION IN 'MAN I LOVE'

"The Man I Love," all-talking romance of the prize ring world, with Madison Square Garden featured, the news review and the short sound subjects, especially the latter, make the bill, which opened at Hunt's Criterian theater yesterday, to continue afternoon and night until Thursday, an interesting one.

Mary Brian.

The romance features those two popular young film players in appealing characters as lovers—Mary Brian and Richard Arlen.

The former, in her characteristic sweet simplicity, is well cast for the chief feminine role, in contrast to that of the woman of the world part played by the sterling Russian actress and former operatic singer, Olga Baclanova, who, by the way, sings a selection in this part.

Arlen well plays a character much different from the type he usually plays—that of a promising young fighter, who, inspired by his love for Celia (Mary Brian), wins the middleweight championship, but just before capturing it is badly beaten and all but knocked out in the 14th round, by the champion, but his manager whispers in his ear that Celia is listening in on the radio and rooting for him to win. Then he perks up wonderfully and goes out and quickly slugs the champion into a has-been. Old stuff.

Olga Baclanova.

Some day a director will produce a film prize-fight picture in which the stuffing is knocked out of the hero pugilistic aspirant for good, and the audiences throughout the land, to show their appreciation of the new type of film prizefight, will get up and madly cheer, and proclaim him a veritable genius.

The short subjects shown in connection with "The Man I Love" are so good that they constitute a meritorious and colorful show in themselves. Especially is this true of the musical review of song hits and dances and feature specialties from the leading musical plays in New York—all shown in beautiful color photography.

This revue features Chas. King, the Broadway comedian singer in dialogue with Noah, Methuselah or some other old guy with long whiskers and flowing kimona, who fished in the Rogue river valley some years after it was the Garden of Eden, according to the local realty board, and has a feminine bare-legged chorus and clever specialties.

Then there is a new kind of talking trailer announcement by Claude Gillingwater, of irascible, old crusty gentleman film fame, telling of the forthcoming appearance here of the beauteous Dolores Costello in her new all-talker, "The Glad Rag-Doll." Some of the scenes from this comedy are shown in the trailer. R. A. K.

NINE LIVES ARE LOST IN SPEEDBOAT CRASH

OMAHA, July 29.—(AP)—One girl is dead and eight others are believed to be drowned as a result of a crash between the speedboat Thriller, and a smaller boat, on Lake Okoboji last night, says a dispatch to the World Herald from Arnolds Park, Iowa.

If you had to fry a dozen chickens you wouldn't fry them all at once

Some would be raw—some would be burnt. One chicken at a time is the best way. And by roasting coffee by their patented, continuous process—a few pounds at a time instead of in bulk—Hills Bros. roast every berry evenly. For the Love of a Lady

by Jeffery Farnol

SYNOPSIS: Sir Richard works desperately to decipher the cryptic message from his late cousin—a puzzle whose solution will expose Julius's murderer and expose the devious plottings against Sir Richard. Aware of Viscount Brocklehurst's plot against Helen D'Arcy, Richard warns her not to venture far from her home and imperatively requests that she meet him at her home at midnight. Meanwhile Helen has been disconcerted that day by the staring of a gypsy-like country fellow, who has come to her estate to work as a gardener.

Chapter 31

MANY SECRETS

OLD Ben greeted my lady Helen effusively, obviously fascinated by her graceful movement that accentuated her marked beauty.

"Will 'ee be a-wantin' your Witch, my leddy?"

"No, no, Ben. I'm here to escape the company, and gossip with thee awhile."

"Why, then—a cheer, my leddy. . . . Jarge, Jarge lad, fetch my elber-cheer."

Geo.ge obeyed, and instantly vanished.

"And now," said my lady, sinking into the elbow chair, "sit and talk to me, Ben; tell me all the news."

"Noos, my leddy?" croaked the old man. "Lordy, there's been arl kolnds o' goin's-on 'ereabouts o' late—some says the village be haunted."

"Haunted, Ben?"

"Ar, ma'm! But first I'll tell 'ee 'bout Maister Oldcroft. You've neered of 'e, my leddy, the foine, smart constabule from Lonnon as thinks 'isself so sharp as a packet o' needles. This 'ere very marnin', they finds this Maister Oldcraft . . . fast i' the stocks . . . lied up in—a sack, an' 'e'd been in they stocks . . . arl night long!"

"But, Ben, how came he there? Who did it?"

"Why, ma'm, 'tis wot nobody doant seem nowise to know, nohow. Joel Bim, as 'elped to foind 'm, du tell me as Maister Oldcraft stank pretty strong o' brimstone!"

"Horrors, Ben!"

"'Orrers be the word, ma'am! There be things 'appening 'ere o' nights as did n't nowise ought! F' instance, theer be th' owd haunted mill—full of orrers every night—gashly loights!"

"How so, Ben?"

"Well they flitters 'ere and theer—they skips and likewise dances. And ye see, nobody don't never go nor ventur a-nigh the place."

"Ax-cuse me, Ben!" said George, appearing suddenly, "but I see Mr. Pitt theer t' other arternoon, along o' one o' the gen'lemen."

"Pitt?" repeated my lady. "Why, then, George was the gentleman Viscount Brocklehurst?"

"Ay, my leddy, it were so, ma'm."

"And what did they do there, George?"

"I dunno, my lady, the Vi-count see me, ma'm, an ordered me off, my lady!"

"That'll du, lad!" cried old Ben shrilly. "That'll du, Jarge. Lord love y'r bootiful eyes, ma'm, theer be nobody can't tell 'ee more 'bout ghostesses an' goblings than me! And right busy they've been o' late. I meets old Truffeni Camlo t'other day. 'Truffeni, ma'm,' says I, 't du seem loike 'twas a curse on the village.' Old Truffeni tells me 'tis a curse, surely, as wunt be took aff till justice be done, and' Sir Richard Guvfford proved innercent. . . . And talkin' o' S' Richard—I seen 'm t' other night!"

"Oh?" said Helen, softly questioning, "where, Ben?"

"In the sunk garden, ma'm, a-starin' at the chimbleys."

Helen raised hand to rounded bosom and was immediately aware of the tickling, crumpled paper.

"At midnight!" she murmured.

"Why, no, ma'm, it were just gone 10 o'clock b' the church chime."

"And he was staring, you say, at—?"

"The Moat 'Ouse chimbleys ma'm. When I calls out, 'e vanishes afore my eyes—and then another strange thing—look wot 'appens to the captain gen'leman, only last noight, as somebody—or some . . .thing took an' throwd 'im down the stairs. And I wants to know—what?"

"A cord, Ben!" answered a sleepy yet strangely pleasant voice, and Helen saw Captain Despard smiling at her over the half-door.

The captain's face was perhaps a little paler than usual, and he bore one arm in a sling, otherwise he seemed as languidly assured, as imperturbably serene as usual.

"A cord, sir?" cried old Ben reproachfully. "But—did 'ee see the cord, sir?"

"Nay, or I should have avoided it. But I felt it fairly catch and I found marks of a cord on one of the banisters."

"But who," cried Helen, "who should work such despicable villainy?"

The captain sighed and shook his head.

"Who knows?" said he gently. "But pray will you not ask me in out o' the sun?"

Here old Ben, meeting the captain's eloquent look, vanished; then the captain, leaning in over the half-door, spoke in softly modulated voice:

"Also, Helen, I desire to talk with you about—our principal, Mr. Richard Guyfford."

"Our principal?" she questioned.

"Undoubtedly, Helen, for are we not his accomplices after the fact? Did we not suppress the evidence of his signet-ring?"

My lady bit her rosy nether-lip and frowned at the point of her dainty shoe. The captain entered the stable and, seating himself gracefully on the corn-bin, quoth he gently:

"You were so passionate to aid him and I have wondered—why?"

"Because I believed him innocent."

"Did you, Helen? But was there not a moment—when you deemed him guilty?"

My lady yawned behind three fingers.

"You become wearisome, sir," sighed she and rose.

"I regret it, madam!" said he rising also. "But regarding Sir Richard, now——"

"He was my friend, sir."

"Happy creature!" murmured the captain. "Your friend! Would you have done as much for any other, for me, Helen? For . . . Brocklehurst?"

My lady being on her feet, swept towards the door even as the odd man, slouched by, pitchfork on shoulder.

"Pray, Helen," sighed the captain, "would you do for any other what you are doing— for him?"

Helen turned, viewed the speaker in wild-eyed amazement.

"I detest riddles, sir," said she loftily. "You must speak plainer."

"Plainer? Is it needful?" he questioned gently. "Yes, upon my life, I do believe it is! Then, Helen, can it be possible you are unaware—that you have no suspicion——"

And then, with a wild clatter of hoofs, the Marquis galloped into stable-yard.

"Alas, Helen—Richard's taken!" he cried. "I met that old fellow Oldcraft on the road who tells me they ha' the poor flow fast by th' heels at last!"

"Ah!" breathed my lady and, though the exclamation was scarce more than whisper, she leaned heavily across the half-door, crushing the harsh edges of that crumpled paper into her tender flesh yet feeling it no whit.

"What can be done?" she questioned breathlessly. "Ned, what can we do? Do something, Ned!"

"Ay, faith!" quoth the Marquis, wheeling his eager animal, "I ride now to comfort the poor soul."

"One moment, my lord!" said Captain Despard. "Pray when was he taken, and where?"

"Last night, sir, at a small place hard by Newhaven."

"Then, my lord, either this information is false or Sir Richard hath since escaped."

"How, sir . . . ha' 'scaped? Pray, wha' d' ye mean?"

"I mean, Marquis, that he is as free as you or I! I saw him—not 10 minutes ago."

"Where, sir—where?" cried the Marquis, glancing about eagerly. "Ten minutes, say you? Then he can't be far! Pray tell us!"

"No, my lord," answered the captain, smiling, "since I have surprised this gentleman's secret, you must suffer me to keep it secret still."

What is Sir Richard's secret that Despard refuses to divulge? Continue the story tomorrow.

RACING SEAPLANE, THOUGH TINY, HAS 1000 H. P. ENGINE

WASHINGTON, July 29.—(AP)—America's hopes to wrest the Schneider seaplane racing trophy from Great Britain are pinned on a small powerful monoplane which has been completed at the Philadelphia naval aircraft factory and is being tested by Lieutenant Al Williams of the navy.

Details of the plane's construction are being guarded. These are known, however, to depart from previous American racing plane practice, in that the craft is of monoplane rather than biplane design. It is powered with the Packard 24-cylinder "X" engine, which is understood to have undergone radical changes at the hands of experts at the naval factory. The engine develops more than 1000 horsepower.

The little seaplane is being given taxiing tests on the Delaware river at Philadelphia and later may be taken to Annapolis for speed tests. It is said to be capable of a speed of more than 300 miles an hour.

If the tests show the little craft up to expectations it will be taken to England by Lieutenant Williams for the Schneider races at Cowes, September 6. The last Schneider race, in 1927, was won for Great Britain by Flight Lieutenant S. N. Webster at Venice, who piloted his super marine racer over the 350 kilometer course at a rate of 281.685 miles an hour. The United States had no entry.

Free Water Heater During Week Sale

A radical departure from the regular policy of dealers of L. & H. electric ranges is being made this week by the Southern Oregon Electric in that they are offering a seven hundred and fifty watt hot water heater free with the sale of each L. & H. electric range made during the week.

"Many have wondered how and why the L. & H. range was named," says Morris Leonard. "They are manufactured by the A. J. Linderman & Hoversen Co. of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and it is the initials of the two men whose names appear in the firm name that designate the range name. This firm has been making ranges for the past forty years and more apartments are equipped with L. & H. apartment ranges in Portland and several other large cities than all other makes combined."
