LOCAL MAIL MAN BECOMES A POET

Without any training except to state that Marion E. Harper, well known city carrier of the Medford Postoffice had written it, and Mr. Harper was in his usual good health, the following poem was handed to a Mail Tribune reporter this forenoon for publication.

The postman is a busy man; He carries all the mail he can, Up one street and down the other, Until he can't tell which from the other.

He walks seven miles every day, And never has no time to play, But travels on with his old pack, Until it almost breaks his back.

He worries about the people's mail, When he has heard some dreadful tale, How they have lost a letter dear, From some good friend across the sphere.

And then he tries to tell them how He'll go and look for it right now, And bring it back to them post haste, Which puts a smile upon their face.

Now, if you think this is not true, Just follow him one long day through, And then when you go home at night, I know you'll think that I am right.
