Russia makes no bones about the fact that the aim of its great industrialization program is to bring about the same efficiency among its workers that America has achieved. Stalin has said no more than once, "So have some of the better lights in the Bolshevik regime.

If there is envy of America in Russia, it does not produce a crop of sour grapes, as in so many other lands of Europe. And most remarkable of all, for so-called American-made is the fact that disparaging remarks upon Americans in general, their customs, manners, clothes and habits—which one can hear daily in every restaurant, train, theater and many saloons of Zealand and the continent—are rarely detected in Russia.

Those who are skeptical of Russia's really liking America and Americans better than any
