Death Treasure

By R. A. J. WALLING

SYNOPSIS: Forced to stop by the highway at night, Veronica found a treasure chest in the trunk of a car. The chest was filled with gold and jewels. She was alone in the car when she found it. She was alone in the car when she found it.

Chapter 21
A CONFIDENT

ADOPTED the affection which Veronica had set up. I asked no questions and showed no surprise. I accompanied Veronica docily to a telephone and stood by while she told her story to Royce. I went with her and her mother to the Inn and bargained for breakfast.

Royce and Somerfield came not long after we had breakfasted. Somerfield readily agreed to take the boat back. He said little during the colloquy between Royce and you could never tell. I found myself hating to go into my studio merely because behind the door of my safe there was a certain black bag.

After lunch I went to rest in a hammock in the garden and in about five minutes I was sound asleep.

I woke up hearing voices. I opened my eyes and saw my mother and Somerfield looking down on me.

"Hello!" said I. "Anything up?"

"Nothing up," mother replied. "Mr. Somerfield called to inquire about your foot."

"I had forgotten the injured foot. Foot's almost right now," I said.

"Then come and take a cup of tea, late as it is," she advised me. My mother left me over her tea.

"Well, Grensen," said Somerfield, "isn't it time to drop the long-handled stunt?"

"If you'd be a little more explicit—"

"Last night's business," he said. "Rather lucky for Royce—"

"Oh, come off it!" exclaimed Somerfield. "I don't know what Andy thinks. But you can't work it off on Grensen. Don't you think Veronica's too recent a girl to be mixed up in this?"

Veronica calmly tells Royce her amazing story of the night's adventure.

Royce, but looked very hard at me, I thought. We waited while he waded out, climbed on board and started the engine.

Then Royce took Veronica in his car, and Mrs. Seabrook drove me home. We were in Blackwater before lunch time, though long after the arrival of Royce and Veronica.

My mother's nerve was quite equal to receiving me as if I had just gone for a stroll after breakfast and come in to lunch. But when, later on, she told me what happened the night before her long-fold appeared literally astonishing.

While Cousin John and I were in his room talking she thought she heard a sound and saw somebody moving in the garden and went out in the direction of her rose garden. While she was there the electric bell in the house rang, but she continued her walk.

Suddenly she heard thudding footsteps. Cousin John and I ran by her within a yard.

Then she gasped at an alarm. She delayed her return to the house for several minutes. Laxton was waiting for her in the drawing-room.

"Sorry I wasn't in, professor," said my mother. "Tom's gone to see my Cousin Merry-weather off. I don't quite know when he'll be back."

"What did he say to that?" I asked her.

"He inquired if Mr. Merry-weather was returning to Blackwater."

"And you—"

"I said I rather expected him back tomorrow."

"Mother?"

"Well, Tom," said she, "so I do, I telephoned to him this morning. He'll be here this evening."

John Merryweather, her cousin, was a rather amiable bachelor, fond of her in his old-boyish way, but I should certainly never have dreamed of dragging him into this business.

"I suppose you know we're skating on thin ice," said I.

"Um, rather enjoying it," she answered. "I rely on your judgment, Tom, to justify all we've done."

But what was just the mischief I could not even rely on my own judgment; it was so hopelessly deflected by the blue eyes of Veronica.

We seemed to have covered our tracks fairly well for the time. But ent began her school term at Gifford creek Tuesday. Mrs. Bonham will drive from her home each day.
