The American Legion Auxiliary held their first meeting after the summer recess Monday night in the armory club rooms with a large attendance. Mrs. Vera Hall, chairman of the committee, reported on the convention.

convention, gave a comprehensive and inspirational report of the proceedings which was well received by the members. She particularly stressed the importance of child welfare and hospital work which the organization is doing, making a strong appeal to the local unit to carry on as they have never done before. Mrs. Chaney, newly elected department president, spoke briefly, pledging herself to the service of the auxiliary, and thanking the unit for their loyal support given her in Salem. Final plans were then made for a waffle booth to be held during fair week. At the close of the business meeting the unit asked the post to hear Medford's latest prize winners, the Auxiliary quartet. After singing two numbers, which were faultlessly rendered, the post gave them a great ovation, thanking the girls for bringing one more trophy to Medford. The Auxiliary then adjourned to the dining room for a watermelon feed served by Mrs. H. Pace and her committee.

Social Events of Church Societies

A great deal of discussion has been given to reducing the work of business men in the annual drive for various social organizations. The thought has been advanced that the business men should be given a more active role in the community.

Eleanora's Dovecote As Bride of Movie Man Is Hudson Castle

When Sam Katz, who heads a chain of 1,200 movie houses, and his recent bride, Eleanora, dancing partner of the late Maurice, return from their honeymoon they will reside on a New York estate which has a private theater and on which the buildings are artificially cooled in summer.

NEW YORK, (AP)—When Sam Katz was a boy in high school on Chicago's west side, he had a dream. He used to hurry from classes to a dingy nickelodeon in the neighborhood, where for $16 a week he played the piano from sheet music.

And when romance flickered on the screen in the little movie house that had been a grocery store, Sam jumped into the melody of "Chérie" in the air and confided from the swaying keys a vision of the castle he was going to build some day.

He is building it now, on a mountain side above the Palisades of the Hudson near New York City. It will be ready in a few months for him and his bride.

His bride is Eleanora Ambrose, the dancer. When Sam was playing a nickelodeon piano she was Eleanor Packett, daughter of a New York pianist, a merchant, police man. She came to New York, she met, danced with, and married Maurice Mousty, and for one glorious year, until Maurice's death in 1926, she shared with him the manor of the Castles and the amusements of supper-club habitués from Broadway to the Riviera.

Katz played the piano until he had saved money enough to buy the nickelodeon. Then he took into partnership his father, Morris, a Jewish barber who had brought his family of six to Chicago, from Russia when Sam was four months old. They saved, bought more nickelodeons, and went into partnership with the four Balaban boys.

Twelve years ago the partners built in Chicago the first of the dozen motion picture houses which now dot the nation.

The mansion that Sam Katz is building for his bride is the central edifice on an estate which encompasses a mountain on the west bank of the Hudson river 25 miles above New York.

The estate also has a hundred-room manor for guests, a sumptuous theater of its own, stables, tennis courts and swimming pools, a garage with space for 150 motor cars—even an air-cooling plant to keep temperatures temperate in all buildings on torrid summer days.

Japanese schools in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Seattle and Honolulu.

The chapter from the study book dealt with the "Characteristics of the American."

The hostesses, Mrs. Lawton and Mrs. Koyper, served tea, cakes and watermelon.

The decorations were simple and attractive, from a light in the center, streamers of ferns and flowers were draped back to form a bowler under which the bride party stood. Pink and white, the color scheme were also found in the costumes of the bride and her attendants, as well as those of the bridesmaids.

Members of the bridal party were: the bride's sister, Miss Esther Miller, as maid of honor, a sister of the groom, Miss Lucy Davis, and Miss Mabel Dunham as bridesmaids. Brother of the bride, Karl B. Miller, best man and Mrs. F. J. Parry and David Katz, bridesmaids.

The party was held at the wedding home, by David Mousty and Caroline Parry, who acted as flower girls. Misses Verma and Mira Davis, Louise Davis and Mabel Cartwright acted as ushers.

Proceeding the ceremony, Professor T. H. Falkenberg, assisted by Mrs. Falkenberg at the piano, played several violin selections before the strains of Mendelssohn's Wedding March announced that the procession was to begin.

Professor Parry sang "O, Promise Me," and Mrs. H. H. Hunsberger officiating at the piano.

Congratulations were extended at the reception held at the home of the bride, Mrs. Anna J. Miller.

Mrs. and Mrs. Davis left for a short trip to the coast and will soon go to Walla Walla where Mr. Davis will continue his line of study.

2 WOMEN RETURN FROM HORSEBACK TRIP TO LAKES

A midway in blue and green, this might be the title of the joyous horseback journey through the Cascade mountains, from which two Medford girls, Helen Horvath and Adelbert Buehler, have just returned.

Likewise 20 of them were visited by the girls—each a sort of shimmering between light and shadow that reflected a different shade of color. There were some lakes that seemed to smile mysteriously behind misty veils of smoke—others that lay in sudden, brilliant places, daring the world to discover them.

Starting out the trip with a bunch of Crater Lake, Diamond Lake and others, they went to the divide to the west side of the Cascade and discovered myriads of new streams, rivulets, each other in beauty. Each night they camped beside a new lake, and morning found them in the saddle again, passing others, as they climbed the mountain peaks, from one side to another.

There were incidents, near Crater Lake, where the girls, who had been riding for some time, were met by a bear in Crater National forest, a ham from their camp, which after a chase for some distance, was dropped as the animal scampered guiltily and frightened off into the brush.

Then there was the time the horse upon which Miss Buehler was riding, succumbed to a fit of colic, gave a great start of distress and work to the ground. The local girl fed herself just in time to escape being crushed beneath the animal which rolled over and over in a convulsion.

The trails in the Crater forest were badly marked according to the girls, and they had difficulty in finding their way. Once or twice on the first part of the trip, their horses came and went, leaving half the day looking for them. At the first week of travel, however, the horses were well trained and stayed close to camp.

Starting out July 29 and traveling over 250 miles on the entire trip, the girls claim that it was the most enjoyable vacation trip they have ever had. When the spring comes they will be in the saddle again, they say, for another year, probably through Crater, which they want to know thoroughly before they set out to judge the rest of the world from the back of a faithful nag.

The many Pub (saloons) in Sydney are reminders of bygone days in the United States.

"The Brewers actually own Australia," one Sydney resident said, and that is very near a fact. Continued labor agitation and strikes have contributed toward making businesses very hard throughout the Commonwealth.

The brewers, however, are thriving, and saloons are contributing to making the moral conditions in Sydney at a low ebb. It is with envy that Australian business men are watching the prosperity that America is enjoying.

"Is prohibition a success?" This is the question that many Australians ask. People ever there seem to be evenly divided as to what Herbert Hoover terms "A noble experiment." Regardless of one's personal opinion of prohibition, it is a relief to return again to the United States where saloon doors are not swinging on every corner.

It is interesting to know that Australia is more near the center of the British Empire than is England. Sydney, the metropolis of the Antipodes, lies about the population of Boston or St. Louis and is the distributing center for not only New South Wales, but all Australia as well. There are many English, Irish and Scotch people in this city but the main population is made up of pure Australians—the latter being tall, straight people with excellent physique. It is not unusual to find both men and women whose six feet in height among the pure Australians.

There are few really busy thoroughfares in Sydney—instead, the business and residential districts are spread over a large area. The streets are winding and many paved with blocks of concrete, these roads will last for years without need of repair.

There are many fine shops in New South Wales great city and it seems to be the tendency of merchants to crowd show windows with as much merchandise as possible. American-made goods are always much in evidence in these stores.

There are many different types of residences in and near the city of Sydney. There are called cottages, which are small, one-story houses of the late Victorian architecture of the Victorian era and the new, modern California-style bungalow, stalling stone dwellings and apartment houses and neat shingled homes. The older, dirty, unimproved business structures are rapidly giving way to new, attractive American-type skyscrapers being built of yellow sandstone.

Sailors on the "Stein," who have sailed the seven seas and visited parts from Singapore to San Pedro, say that Sydney's famous harbor exceeds in beauty and commercial advantages those of the de Janeiro and Naples and the famous waters around Constantinople and Bosphorus.

In entering this wonderful harbor the Steers steamed past the world famous Sydney Heads to join hundreds of vessels from all parts of the world—Europe, Asia, Africa, North and South America. It is a natural harbor deep and well protected from the winds and storms that almost constantly sweep the eastern coast of Australia. The Sydney harbor is actually a winding lake or stream with hundreds of inlet-enclosed bays, the last new Australia, the "Antipodes" and "Australia" to her dock near the Circular Quay. Within sight of the Matson docks is a bit of land smaller than Alcatraz Island in San Francisco Bay, where prisoners were quarantined many years ago. It will be remembered that Australia was originally used by England as a penal colony.

According to tradition the ships which swam Sydney harbor were fed daily from the banks of this small island to discourage the prisoners from attempting to swim the channel to the mainland.

A great bridge which will span one neck of the harbor is now under construction and Australia people are very proud of this great enterprise.

Melbourne, in Victoria, is much more like an English city than is Sydney—here the business structures and residences as well as the people themselves show much more of the American influence.

Horse racing is one of the popular sports of Melbourne and the famous Melbourne Cup is one of the world's great racing events.

Upon arriving in Sydney, a little group of terra sailors accosted an Aussie policeman for information as to the proper street car to take for the Central station building.

"Oh, I say, chappie, you wish a tram? Right! There's your car, Gondo! Right as this way. Cherrito!"

That's the kind of talk you have to expect in Australia. The "ch" is certainly popular down there. Everything is "Gondo," "Right" and "Cherrito." And, of course, street cars are unknown. They are "Trams" in Australia and "Englands."

One of the most beautiful attractions in New South Wales is the Blue Mountain country, about 75 miles distant from Sydney and reached by the interesting little English-type railway.

Here are high mountain peaks, countless water falls of amazing beauty, luxuriant gum wood forests, deep canyons with a yellow lining of Australian wattle trimmed with Christmas bush, monkey vines and luxuriant tree ferns. Awe-inspiring caves like the Oregon Caves are there, too, to attract the pleasure-seeking Australians. The Blue Mountains, though, not as fiery as the Shikloos and the Cascades, have a beauty of their own.

Wentworth Falls is one of the finest of the attractions in this beautiful country and there could be no more delightful outing than visiting the picturesque little Wentworth Falls hotel and seeing the wonderful Blue Mountain country under the guidance of Stan King, world war hero and as first guide as ever trod a trail and tipped a sparkling red glass of Penfolds around a camp fire.

Stan was one of the famous "Aussies" who spilled his blood in the battle fields of Flanders back in the dark days of the great war.

At the little Wentworth Falls hotel the guests are awakened in the early hours by a hair-raising commotion caused by the prospect of hearing on a first pan. It sounds like a steam boiler factory opening for the day. Half an hour later the guests are thus roused from their slumbers, breakfast is served.

It was a cold night when the train left the busy Central Station bound for the Blue Mountains, so passengers were provided with hot water. The conductor bus these warmers through the odd little railway cars and slips, one under the feet of passengers who are shivering from the chilly winter air.

It is spring now in Australia and the flowers are bursting forth in great profusion. Soon the railroad conductors will have a sign of relief when they pack away the food warmers for the summer months.—Helen Grey.

Editors Note: Another article on Australia by Helen Grey will appear in an early issue of the Mail Tribune.

Automobiles, Movies and Song Hits Of American Origin Found By Grey During Recent Visit In Australia

It is surprising how little is known of the far away country of Australia. Yet this great Commonwealth, who will and who inhabit in many sections, is one of the most beautiful and fertile of the world's principal lands. Sydney, New South Wales, American motor cars are even more widely used than the old little British make machines, and many beautiful American type theatres show the latest movie thrillers from Hollywood and feature on their stages players from the States. American song hits are played on American radio, phonographs, hand organs and pianos, while most of Sydney's inhabitants eat sing and whistle "The Roadway Melody" and Australian jangle bands get real "hot" sensation on "Trips" and other dance selections from this country.

The new State theatre, just off George street in the heart of Sydney, would rival most of the big galleries in this country. American, however, would object to the long 28 and 45 minute intermissions during which time attendants will easily bare and tuck connections to the patrons. During this lengthy pause many of the men wear their hats—a rather custom noticeable to visitors.

Theatre goers attending Australian shows, like in English cities, purchase "stalls" or boxes in their desired "circle." According to the usual English custom, the orchestra plays "God Save The King" at the conclusion of the show. It seemed good to hear the big Regent theatre orchestra strike up "The Stars and Stripes Forever" following the usual British national anthem.
