COULD NOT SLEEP NIGHTS

Helped by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Fairhaven, Mass.—"I am taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound during the change of life. When I feel nervous and run-down my husband gets me a bottle right away. It is a great help to me and I think that if other people would only take it when they feel all run-down and take it the directions say, they would find it a great benefit. My worst symptoms were nervousness and tired feelings. I could not sleep nights and I was so nervous I would cry if anyone looked at me."—Mrs. Ava Bess, 196 Washington Street, Fairhaven, Mass.

Death Treasure

By R. A. J. WALLING

SYNOPSIS: Tom Greenstein writes a letter to Veronica but it contains more than Laxton's message. In the hands of Cousin John, for Tom really means a letter that has been in his mind ever since he met Veronica's mother five years ago. Somerfield and Tom deliver the treasure of the troublesome block long to Laxton. He makes mysterious business of buying a package and Father's exhortations and places it under a police guard. Three days later Veronica jumps off a train into Tom's arms—no accident this time. Veronica brings a companion—she, was Miss Vandenssen, but says to Mrs. Redslade of Newplace. Veronica postpones her explanation but later that day, she and Tom are alone in the Woodrow Wilson program and an acceptance, happiness for two!

Chapter 29
KEDSLADE'S STORY

SOMERFIELD stood the shock of the new relation between me and Veronica with his usual sang-froid when we told him at dinner last night.

At nine o'clock came an urgent message from Laxton demanding the instant presence of Somerfield and myself at the Lord Nelson. He took us at once to his room.

"Mr. Redslade!" said he.

A tall man rose from a chair at the table. I started back, unable to suppress a cry.

"Cousin John!"

Blind as it may seem, we had not till that moment dreamed of connecting the fugitive with Redslade. The legend of his death had been firmly established in our minds. But now explanations of the inexplicable rushed up in a flood. But also, with them, fresh conundrums.

Why had he masqueraded as Mr. Richard? Spent three years in prison? Allowed his ancestral estate to be dissipated while he had one fortune lying in a Belgian bank, and another in gold and jewels apparently at his hand?

And, above all, what was Veronica's part in the complication?

Laxton was speaking:

"I've arranged with Mr. Fotherbury for Eastley to come to Newplace at half-past nine and meet us there. I think we shall then get to the bottom of Pell's riddle. But Mr. Greenstein and Mr. Somerfield ought to be put wise to the preliminaries, I think, eh?"

Redslade objected.

"Well, we needn't drag it out. This was how it shaped. Mr. Redslade unexpectedly inherited Newplace while he was a youth in the army, where he struck up his close friendship with Pell. He did not come of age till the war was over. Then he found himself the owner of an estate so encumbered that he could not keep it up. He got into the hands of the money-lenders, and finally he fell to the share of the firm of Smithins. They made an arrangement with him to discharge all the mortgages on Newplace and give him a new one—a real thumper.

"His realizers were dead against the arrangement, but the sight of £10,000 in cash was too much for him. Very soon he couldn't keep up his interest. Then Smithins jumped on him.

"Mr. Redslade was ruined. Not long before he had met Miss Vandenssen and fallen in love with her. And that brings me to Pell and the Seabrokes—because it was Pell who introduced him to the Seabrokes at their apartment in the Rue Rogier, and there that he met Miss Vandenssen.

"You've already got the hang of Pell's identity—Phillip Lincoln, an old acquaintance of Mrs. Seabroke in her younger days, a neighbor of Lincoln's mother, Pell, in two holidays in Belgium, had visited Mrs. Seabroke in Brussels and her daughter at Brugge.

"On the third visit, in 1924, he had his friend Redslade with him. Pell was a man of different social rank from Mr. Redslade—an accountant in the city. At various times, he made violent efforts to save Mr. Redslade from his beating sin of gambling. They all failed.

"Now, you know that Pell and Mr. Redslade were together in Brussels in the summer of 1925. Pell had gone with him to Ostend at the most desperate point in his fortunes, just after the foreclosure on Newplace. Pell feared what Redslade might do—he tried to commit suicide. You know that the report of his death was accepted as a fact.

"But Pell rescued him that night. He chided his mad gambler friend along the digue from the Casino to the Quai des Fiebours, where he went over into the water. Pell, followed, dragged him ashore in the darkness of the railway pier, spent two awful days with him in one of the back slums of Ostend, and finally took him off to Brugge in the hope that Miss Vandenssen would cure him of his melancholia.

"Miss Vandenssen was staying in Brugge with the Seabrokes. They went there, and unhappily found that Commander Seabroke, whom they both then met for the first time, had joined his family.

"You know Commander Seabroke. To him, Redslade as owner of Newplace was a desirable acquaintance. But when Pell brought to his house this ruined man, appearing to claim sympathy and the hand of his daughter's friend, Seabroke saw red. There was a terrible row.

"Pell took him away. But the report of his own death suggested to Redslade the conduct that caused all the trouble afterward. He would have one fling with his last few hundred francs. If he lost, he would stay dead.

"The same night was the night of the seven coups at the Kursaal. Mr. Redslade knew nothing of Marling's presence in the crowd if he was there. Neither did Pell.

"They did meet Marling on the boat next morning. He seemed anxious to avoid them, but they were full of a scheme for employing the windfall to come to some arrangement with Smithins, and they mentioned it to Marling. He would listen to nothing. Again Mr. Redslade made a false step. He told Marling he meant to remain dead till the question was settled, and that he and Pell were going to stop at the Lord Warden that night.

"At Dover they lost sight of him. What Marling did in the few hours between the arrival of the boat and 10 o'clock at night when the scuffle took place on the cliffs we can only guess. There's something in the background of that.

"But the actual fact is that Mr. Redslade and Pell were attacked by three men whom they did not know and might have come badly off if Mr. Redslade had not been a bit of a bruiser and an expert with the upper cut—"

Laxton rubbed his chin and smiled with mock ruefulness.

"He got a bit too much weight behind it that time and laid out his man too permanently. The essential point is that when they chased the other men who ran away, they found three runnings, not two, and they overtook the third—who was Marling."

I gasped.

"Ah," said Somerfield. "Nasty person, the padre! But why—"

"Why didn't they snaffle him? Once more, Mr. Redslade's inability to see that in this country a man can't stay anonymous without great risk to himself. He has to keep Marling out of the picture because Marling knows him. So he lets Marling go.

"After the chase they come and find the man they knocked unconscious. In a fit of mistaken conscientiousness they tell the police. They give their false names. And then the die is cast. That's irrevocable.

"When the man dies they are in the cart, and presently out of the cart into the jug. And all the rest follows as the night the day. I could moralize on it—but if I do we shall keep Mr. Fotherbury waiting."

Redslade had fidgeted during the latter part of Laxton's recital. Now he jumped up.

"Shall we go and flush it off?" said he.

"Right away," Laxton replied. "Pity that the only character missing from the play is Hamlet. Marling won't be there. . . . I'll take the book of the words, Mr. Redslade."

Laxton picked up from the table the volume which had been lying for some days in my bookshelf, and we went out to visit Newplace Abbey.

a fountain pen is useless to jack up an automobile. . . . but a Waterman's will jack up the handwriting of anyone who has never before used a Waterman's just about 100% in a very few weeks, besides lifting off the mind and hand every writing care. Waterman's is even more necessary for success in college than an automobile.

The outstanding and exclusive qualities of Waterman's are responsible for its dominating place in the fountain pen world. First, there is the hard rubber holder that is light, stainless and perfectly balanced. Next, the unlimited opportunity to select a pen point that exactly suits your style of writing. And big ink capacity that enables you to write constantly for several days without refilling.

Waterman's No. 7 is the newest and most appealing idea in fountain pens. There are seven different pen points to choose from—each identified by a different color band on the cap.

Ask any dealer to show you Waterman's No. 7 and select the point that best suits your style of writing.
