HILLS BROS COFFEE

THE LUXURY HUSBAND

SYNOPSIS: Barbara Landon, young, beautiful and wealthy, suddenly stopped dancing, her eyes riveted on the saxophonist of the ship's orchestra. Her partner, Ralph Henderson, an Englishman with the prospect of a title in the future but at present chiefly concerned with his decent finances, gazed hopelessly after her as Barbara rushed toward the amazed saxophone player. Ray Lowther managed to hide his surprise, however, and his casual greeting was a deep sigh for Barbara. But she was not deterred and insisted on meeting Ray on the top deck after the dance—in clear up the rays of the last three years—memories of a letter past which Ray obviously did not wish to revise.

Chapter 2 EXPLANATIONS AS Barbara made her way quickly towards the staircase that led below Ralph Henderson intercepted her. "Our dance, I think?" His voice was purposely cold. "Yes, it?" she said, smiling in a vague way. "Then, quickly. But I'm afraid you'll have to excuse me. I'm not going to dance again tonight." Immediately he was all sympathy. "Feeling a little under the weather?" She laughed at that. The young Englishman, in an aggrieved silence, escorted her to the door and, having watched her disappear down the stairway, walked back to join Mrs. Trenton Jones. "Barbara doesn't seem herself tonight," he remarked caustically. "She says she doesn't care to continue dancing. I doubt if she can be well."

Barbara was pleading desperately with the man she loved.

"Humph! That's unusual. I didn't think even a sprained ankle could keep Barbara from dancing!" They sat for some time in silence, the man staring moodily at the dancers as she smoked one cigarette after another. The passengers were a merry, informal crowd, and several of the girls called out to him gaily as they danced by. But their evident good spirits only served to increase his ill humor.

"Look here, Mrs. Trenton Jones," he said presently, folding his arms and looking down at his shiny patent leather toes. "I may as well frank with you, I'm in love with Barbara. Do you think there's any hope for me?"

The older woman considered him for a long minute. He was good looking, blond, square-jawed type of Britisher. Well-molded features, blue eyes, a reddish complexion and a small mustache, a shade lighter than his hair. There was a certain air of birth and breeding about him.

"So many men have been in love with Barbara," she told him, "or have thought that they were. That's the penalty she pays for being an heiress."

A dull red spread over the man's face. "I say, you're not suggesting that I—"

"I didn't mean to insinuate anything. But had she been penniless I wonder if you would have allowed yourself to fall in love with her?"

That's a fair question, and I'll be candid with you," he answered. "I should have been just as keen, but I couldn't have afforded to marry her."

Death of Fish in Upper Rogue Explained by Gold Beach Paper

In a recent editorial the Curry County Reporter, a weekly newspaper of Gold Beach, tells residents of the upper Rogue river why there is a shortage of steelheads in the upper reaches of this noteworthy Oregon fishing stream. "The real reason for the shortage of fish on the upper Rogue," reads the editorial, "is that the upper Rogue district is guilty of serious omissions and commissions. Communities on the upper river have done and still are doing more to destroy fish in the stream than can be counteracted by artificial propagation work of state and federal agencies combined."

"What about the diversion of one-half of the natural flow of the waters of the Rogue on irrigation projects?" "What about the saturation of the other half of the water in the stream with sewage of Grants Pass, Medford and other upper communities?"

"What about the destruction of natural spawning grounds of the fish by mining operations and the destruction of young fish by the mud and silt permitted to flow from the mines into the stream?" "What about the destruction, for long years past, of fish by irrigation projects?"

"What about the obstructing dams for hydro-electric plants on the Rogue, such dams being found only on the upper reaches of the river?" "Millions of young salmon and steelheads are being destroyed each year in the upper Rogue, and this destruction is being continued."

"What are Grants Pass sportsmen and newspaper men doing to remedy such conditions?"

MEDFORD WOMEN VISIT ASHLAND BUSINESS HOSLER FLORAL GARDEN MEN SEE NEW TOWN

ASHLAND, Ore., Oct. 2.—(Sp.)—A delegation of a dozen prominent Medford women, active members in the Medford Garden club, were in Ashland on Saturday morning to pay an official visit to the Harry Hosler Gardens on Almond street. The visitors took about two hours for a careful survey of the Hosler flowers and questions in regard to the varieties and the grower's cultivation methods. The ladies were most appreciative of Mr. Hosler's generosity and were enthusiastic over the late autumn showings, which have, as yet, been untouched by the light frosts. Gorgeous gladioli and mammoth dahlias offer great masses of color.

Mr. Hosler has possibly a greater number of varieties than any other grower in the state, certainly than any other grower in southern Oregon. The exhibit is conceded to be one of the finest on the Pacific coast. At the recent Jackson county fair, Mr. Hosler took a long list of awards as prizes in every entry made.
