THE LUXURY HUSBAND

BY MAYSIE OREID

SYNOPSIS: Barbara Landon is wealthy and beautiful and also desirably to have with Ray Henderson, a penniless musician in the orchestra of the ship on which she is a passenger. Three years before they were engaged, and Ray, suddenly learning of the loss of his own fortune, disappeared, believing their marriage impossible under the circumstances. When they unexpectedly meet on the boat, Barbara begs Ray to marry her. He still loves her, but refuses the proposal, and Barbara, who she will change his mind. She deliberately makes herself conspicuous by an outrageous flirtation with a fortune-hunting nobleman, Ralph Henderson, in a last, mad effort to win the man she loves.

Chapter 6 A PROPOSAL ACCEPTED HENDERSON was elated at Barbara's agreement to attend his house-party and ordered another bottle of champagne on the strength of it. In his growing exhilaration he failed to notice the mysterious manner in which Barbara was emptying her champagne glass—without drinking its contents.

Midnight found them still in the smoking room surrounded by a hilarious group of girls and men. Barbara was talking loudly, slurring one word into another.

"Tired of sitting here. Want to dance. C'mon and dance, Hendy!"

Ray pushed into the room, grasped Barbara roughly and carried her off.

"Don't be silly, Barbara, we can't dance here. There's no music."

"Want to dance anyhow," she retorted. "Be a sport, Hendy, dance with Barbara!"

But, drunk as he was, Henderson was too typically British to relish making himself a laughing stock in public. However, she appeared obdurate, and presently with the cry of, "If you won't dance with me, then I'll dance by myself," she sprang up onto one of the neighboring tables.

Immediately all eyes were focused upon her and someone shouted, "Give us a dance."

Just for one moment she appeared to hesitate. Then, her chin stuck out and her eyes hard with determination, she commenced a furious stage dance. Her lithe body moved gracefully, her feet hardly seemed to hit the table and when she paused for breath the whole room broke into spontaneous applause.

Ten minutes later, Len Hickson rushed into the cabin where Ray was sitting on his bunk getting ready for bed.

"Say, Ray!" he shouted excitedly, "what do you think that Landon girl is doing now? She's up in the smoke room doing a dance on one of the tables! She's sent down to offer us 100 bucks each if we'll go up and give her a tune."

Ray stared at him for a moment incredulously, then, as he sprang to his feet, his hand shot out and he grasped the "nobleman's" shoulder.

"What are you saying?" he demanded hoarsely. "Do you mean to tell me that Barbara—Miss Landon is up there dancing before those drunken soots? You must be mad."

"I'm not. Pick up your sax, boy. The fellow who gave me the dope said for us to hurry."

But Ray did not need to be told to do that! Already he had pushed Len aside and had bounded out of the cabin.

In no time he was in the smoke room and, as he elbowed his way roughly through the crowd that surrounded the table on which Barbara was standing, there was a look in his eyes that spoke murder to anyone who dared interfere with him.
