

Local and Personal

The deer hunting season will come to a close at sundown this evening and hundreds of hunters who went to the hills within the past few days for their last try, will begin trekking home. In general the season has been a successful one, although to what degree will not be known for several days until Game Warden Roy Parr completes his checking up of the number of deer killed. The pheasant and quail season, however, will not end until October 31, and the duck season will last until January.

More sport fishermen are enjoying the excellent fishing on the lower Rogue this season than in any former year. There are so many anglers on the stream that there are not boats to accommodate them and many boat owners have long waiting lines. The river, from its mouth up stream for 50 miles, is filled with fine fish, which are striking the bait. In the still water near the mouth of the stream, fine catches of chinook and silverides are being made and all who try get the limit of steelhead on the riffles a few miles up stream.—The Oregonian.
