Fifth Radio Talk on Boscs, Broadcast by Winter Pear Committee, in Detroit

The fifth radio talk broadcast over the Detroit station by the Winter Pear Committee last week is as follows: "Bosc pears from Medford, Oregon; Old Gold Outside, Sugared Sunshine Inside. "A beautiful golden yellow, mellow to the touch, there is no fruit that can compare with the Medford Bosc. Try one. Call up your retail store or fruit stand and sample Medford's best. You will not be disappointed. The Bosc pear speaks for itself. It is the king of all pears."

"In previous talks we have told you about the outstanding merits of the Bosc pear; its history, its food value and other items pertaining to the soil and climate in which it thrives best. Today we wish to tell you the way in which it is handled, from the earliest stage of growth until it is placed on the fruit stand ready for sale. "We will pass up the Bosc tree itself, its origin and the many reasons why, as a tree, it thrives best in the Medford district. We wish to picture for you the fruit itself from the bud stage to the highly finished article we desire you to eat."

"In the very early stages of its life the Bosc is subject to cold mornings in the early spring days. Sometimes the temperature outdoors reaches 24 degrees above zero, which is sufficient to prevent damage to the pear in the early stages of development. "A little later the pear is sprayed several times to prevent the codling moth from laying eggs on the fruit which, in turn, would cause the fruit to be wormy and unfit for consumption. "As the fruit develops it requires much moisture in the soil for it to become a perfect specimen. Lacking rain, the orchardist irrigates his orchard from a supply of water stored in reservoirs that are sometimes 40 or 50 miles distant. Huge canals bring pure mountain water to the fertile valleys with the result the orchardist keeps the pear tree in good healthy condition. "Possibly the most interesting picture is the heavily loaded pear tree. Nothing can excel Nature when at its best. Many of the other pear trees will pick 20 to 50 bushels of pears which are carefully loaded in low-slung wagons and hauled to the shed preparatory to the fruit being conveyed by trucks from the orchard property to the packing house. "The fruit as it arrives at the packing house is generally a little dusty and shows a distinct trace of spray residue. The pears are carefully sorted by experienced help as to extra fancy grades. Thereafter the fruit is carefully washed and dried so all of the spray residue is entirely removed. "The Medford district was the pioneer in washing fruit perfectly clean and first to comply with the government regulations, insisting upon a product free from spray residue and other foreign matter. Medford pears need not be wiped or washed before eating. The pear as it emerges from the washing machine is immaculate and is immediately carefully wrapped in paper which prevents contamination until it is delivered to the consumer. "So far no other district can compare with Medford, Ore., for quality of pears, cleanliness and excellence of pack. It is a model for all to copy and no better comparison of its up-to-date methods could be asked than to say it is annually visited by orchardists and packers from other fruit sections to see what is being done at Medford to maintain the excellence of pack and quality of fruit offered as the buying public. "Prepared to do still better work. Under the leadership of the Medford Winter Pear Committee, which is putting on this sales campaign in the city of Detroit, Professor Henry Hartman of the Oregon State college is spending six months in the large eastern centers making a study of the pears from the Medford district. "As a result of his work, which is too technical to permit of discussion over the radio, the fruit growers of the Medford district hope to plant the fruit stands in this and other large eastern cities a year approximately ready to eat. "Much criticism has been made of all fall and winter varieties of pears due to the fact that they were often placed on the stands hard, firm, green, utterly inedible and in such condition as to preclude their use by the public in large quantities. "This situation will be remedied, Medford Bosc pears, under the direction of Prof. Henry Hartman, will be offered when ready to eat and in such a condition as to appeal to the most fastidious person. Why Detroit, Mich., Was Selected "Over 90 per cent of the Bosc
