MILLIONS OF POUNDS USED BY OUR GOVERNMENT

The Secret of Mohawk Pond

By Natalie Sumner Lincoln

SYNOPSIS: Unseen enemies attempt to make life at Yew Lodge unbearable for Peggy Prescott, heir to the estate of its former master Herbert Prescott, an uncle. She finds welcome aid in her former neighbor, Obadiah Evans and his handsome son, Jim, whom she is faced with murder charges for fatally shooting a nocturnal intruder identified as Lieut. Edgar Stanton, her uncle's intimate friend. Peggy's interest in Jim grows and she makes him her confidant, but is somewhat annoyed by his seeming impersonal interest in her plight. Jim goes to engage counsel for her, and Obadiah's interest in Sundown, an Indian who Prescott befriended is heightened by the suspicions voiced by Aquilla Chase, botanist, who is a twin brother of the executor of the Prescott estate.

Chapter 13.

THE SILHOUETTE

THE light from Obadiah's electric torch revealed the outline of the tent that was Sundown's home as the farmer and Chase approached.

His low hail went unanswered; repeated, it again met with no response.

Shifting his torch to his left hand, he pulled aside the tent fly and climbed unceremoniously inside.

The light from his torch fell on a blanketed figure lying on one side of the bed, and he kept its rays turned full in Sundown's face as the half-breed's eyes opened.

Obadiah's torch illumined the swarthy features of Sundown on the cot.

"You must be kin to the seven sleepers, Sundown."

Obadiah helped himself to the only chair while the little botanist, his figure hidden by the farmer's bulky frame, with a comprehensive glance around so much of the tent as he could see, selected an overturned box and sat down on it.

The board creaked under his weight and Sundown's head turned inquiringly in Chase's direction just as the battery in the torch died, leaving the three men in total darkness.

"Sit still, Sundown. I'm Evans, of Echo farm," and the half-breed remained where he was, sitting erect in bed. "Where have you been for the past 10 days?"

"I go to Torrington."

The half-breed's low melodious tones were in striking contrast to Obadiah's Yankee twang. "To the hospital there."

"What for?" Obadiah asked.

"The doctor, he promised help for my eyes."

"Your eyes," repeated Obadiah speculatively. "So you are seeing better at night, eh?"

"No"—the soft voice was touched with melancholy—"the doctor says not."

"Humph, you wouldn't need a doctor to tell you that, I'm thinking."

Obadiah bent forward, a second later a match flared up directly before Sundown's face and Obadiah stared into the black, lusterless eyes—with widely distended pupils. The match burnt his fingers before he tossed it down and stepped on it. Sundown moved slightly.

"There is a lantern—" Obadiah cut short the suggestion.

"No; we'll talk in the dark, with no advantage to either," he said. "Where were you last night?"

"In bed."

"Where?" the insistent voice went on.

Underneath the blanket the half-breed fingered the steel blade of a dagger lying across his lap. Suddenly he spoke, almost intoning his words.

"Darkness overtook me and I slept out in the open; my bed was my blanket under the skies."

"Whereabouts?"

"To the eastward of Mohawk summit."

"There are two summits. Which do you mean?"

The rising wind, betokening the approaching storm, came through the open flap and billowed out the walls of the tent. It also carried to Sundown's sensitive nostrils the smell of tobacco—smoke from Obadiah's pipe had reached him before, now he detected Chase's cigar.

"Who have you here, Mr. Evans, besides yourself?" he demanded. "The man on the woodbox, who is he?"

"An old acquaintance, Sundown."

Aquila Chase broke his long silence.

"Chase, the botanist."

"Ah, welcome!"

Sundown's musical voice held a cordial note as he turned his head in Chase's direction.

"And why have you not spoken before?"

"He hadn't a chance."

Obadiah chuckled again and ignoring the half-breed's attempt to switch the conversation, reverted to his former question. "Where were you, Sundown, on East or West Summit?"

"On neither, but between the two," was the cryptic reply.

"Your ears are keen if your vision isn't," Obadiah said. "Did you hear Lieutenant Stanton ride through the pass and along the path toward Fire Tower—say somewhere between midnight and two o'clock this morning?"

Another and more violent gust of wind dislodged some pans on the table; they fell with a clatter to the floor, drowning Sundown's voice, and Obadiah caught only his closing words.

". . . none ride with safety down the pass at night."

"But he did." Chase, unable longer to keep silent burst into the conversation. "And Stanton reached Yew Lodge?"

"So!" Without sound Sundown wriggled toward the foot of his bed, getting closer to the tent opening. "And who met him there?"

"Death."

"Glory to God! Glory to God! Glory to God!"

The half-breed's chant came to Obadiah between gusts of wind and he sprang up.

"Stop it!" he ordered. Stop it! Is that all the Christianity the parson taught you? Stanton's dead, I tell you; don't holler like that."

The chant ceased as suddenly as it had begun.

"What killed the lieutenant?" he asked.

"A bullet."

Chase also had risen and advancing, touched Obadiah's elbow.

"Miss Prescott mistook Lieutenant Stanton for a burglar."

The bed shook under Sundown, consumed with wild, uncontrollable mirth; his hands clamped over his mouth smothered all sound.

"Let's go. I'll see you tomorrow, Sundown," Obadiah said.

The storm broke as they approached Yew Lodge.

"Run, Mr. Chase; I left the gates open," and as the botanist sped down Mohawk Lane, he started to run also, only to catch his foot in an exposed tree root and fall headlong on the ground.

The breath knocked from him, Obadiah lay still for a second, then rolled partly on his right side. In that position he faced Yew Lodge, the long, low building, entirely dark, looking even larger against the waters of the pond beyond. He was about to get to his knees when he saw a light at the lower window.

Surprised, Obadiah remained where he was. It was approaching midnight, of that he was certain; which, then, of the Lodge's inmates had the temerity to wander in the cellar at that hour of the night—Peggy Prescott or Julia, her maid?

Mechanically he wiped the water from his eyes, his gaze fixed steadfastly upon the clear-cut silhouette—it was as familiar as his dead wife's features! But Jim was supposed to be spending the night at Litchfield!

Flickering lights and the padlocked basement room intrigue Obadiah and Aquila in tomorrow's installment.

MURDER MYSTERY TURNS OUT TO BE A PRANK OF BOYS

TOLEDO, Ore., Dec. 2.—(AP)—What looked to be a promising murder mystery centering about the discovery of the dismembered body of a young girl in an abandoned automobile here, today dissolved into the ambitious efforts of several youngsters to house their dogs in an ingenious kennel.

Sheriff W. H. Horsfall, as he unraveled the mystery, said the children of Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Mackay had a fine litter of bull pups but no kennel. They improvised a home for the dogs in the tonneau of an abandoned automobile parked near their home.

Generous butchers provided bones and the pups lived high during the summer months until they reached a more mature age and joined the adult canine circles of Toledo.

Among the juicy bits offered by butchers was the leg of a bear. The car was sold Friday to J. E. Chapin, auto wrecker, and while he was dismantling the car discovered the leg. He notified a night marshal and they bustled the bear leg to a doctor's office who said it might be a human bone.

But Sheriff Horsfall, with true sleuthing instinct, upset the mystery and Toledo went back to its lumber industry.

Theatres

Nancy Carroll, romantic singing-dancing actress, is coming to the Craterian today in the big attraction, "Sweetie" in which she plays the title role.

"Sweetie" is a play-revue of youth and pep, stage and "prep"—it has been referred to by showmen as "the 'Good News' of the talking screen." Miss Carroll is the chorus girl performer who falls in love with a prep school boy and later falls heiress to the very school where he is a student.

There are songs galore, dancing girls and boys by the score in this big extravaganza. Song numbers that all will be whistling are "Sweeter Than Sweet," "He's So Unusual," "Alma Mammy" and "Bear Down."

Jack Oakie, graduate of the stage and vodvil who has become a great favorite after three big roles in talking pictures, puts over a rib-breaking smart-cracker characterization—that of "Tap-Tap" Thompson, the big-time hoofer and song-plugger. He sings "Alma Mammy" in a burlesque graduation scene.

Helen Kane, the tiny-voiced girl with the big brown eyes, sings three numbers.

Governor Larson emphasized the fact that it was largely at the urging of Mr. Baird, recognized as the most powerful Republican leader in the state, that Mr. Morrow was to become the senator. Mr. Baird, the governor said has been eager to have New Jersey choose the man best fitted to aid President Hoover, and has been ready at all times to efface himself from the picture.

Choosing an Optometrist

No physical defect contributes more directly to fatigue and resulting inefficiency than faulty eyesight. Out of the 42,000,000 persons employed in the United States, 25,000,000 have defective vision that handicaps them in their work.

Uncorrected faulty eyesight is the cause of 50 per cent of all the automobile accidents in the United States, according to reports from the state of California.

Statistics show that three out of ten persons are wearing glasses to correct faulty eyesight. Seven out of ten have uncorrected faulty eyesight, 90 per cent of which is due to defective eyes.

Ninety per cent of all eye accidents in industrial life are preventable by the wearing of protection goggles. Tinted lenses save the eyes.

Better vision may be assured to a degree impossible in any preceding period of the world's history. A greater appreciation of the importance of eyesight implies periodic eye care.

In choosing your Optometrist let your decision be the result of good judgment. Optometric service should include a conscientious, accurate diagnosis; quality lens, skilled workmanship, and the examination of eyes at frequent intervals. You can instantly realize why a competent Optometrist should be consulted when you consider the delicate operation of the eye.
