The Secret of Mohawk Pond By Natalie Sumner Lincoln

Chapter 17 AN EMPTY ENVELOPE DESPITE the depressing effect the series of mysterious happenings had had on Peggy, she was glad to be back at the lodge. Temporarily it was home, and she found comfort in the tenderness with which Julia made her comfortable in a wicker chair on the veranda and bathed her sprained foot.

Her thoughts crowded each other as the events of the past two weeks passed in quick review. She viewed with chagrin her visit to the Evans farm where she had gone, impulsively, to return the letter from Obadiah Evans. It had brought only further misfortune and the puzzling discovery of the army holster which she had concluded must be Jim's.

Suddenly she sat bolt upright. "Julia! Where's my handbag?" Julia's jaw dropped open. "Miss Peggy, dear, don't sneer me to death!" she gasped. "Dar's yo' hair, hangin' on yo' left arm."

Peggy glanced down; sure enough there hung her bag by its strap over her arm in which she had clutched the folded half sheet brought from Echo farm; the latter she had thrown down on the table close beside her chair. Peggy's feeling of relief changed and clear-cut features; in a big, to one of alarm on seeing that her bag hung open. Dragging it forward she went hurriedly through its contents, finally spilling everything into her lap.

"It's gone, Julia; oh, it's gone!" "Lawsy, honey, do keep calm," advised Julia, her own eyes bulging with excitement. "How much yo' all done los'?" "Not money, Julia—a letter," Peggy glanced up and down the veranda.

"Go through the living room and out on the steps; perhaps I dropped it getting out of the car. Hurry!" In the maid's absence, she examined her bag more carefully—the catch was bent, evidently in her fall climbing over the stone wall.

"I done looked ebrywhar, but da letter ain' dere." Julia's troubled voice caused Peggy to look up. "What was it like, Miss Peggy; ennything special?" "No; don't mind. Thanks, Julia. Go and call Dr. Eastman, like a dear; ask for the Litchfield exchange, they'll give you his office."

Left to herself Peggy sank back in her chair. Had the letter to Obadiah Evans dropped out of her bag in the meadow on her way to Echo Farm, in the farmhouse itself, or in the Ford car? If at Echo Farm, Obadiah would be sure to find it, possibly also in the meadow, but suppose Aquila Chase had inadvertently carried it off with him? At that, finding it, the botanist might suppose the hired boy had dropped it in his car; anyway he would be sure to give it to Obadiah.

Oh, if she hadn't been such a fool trying to bring back the empty holster concealed in the folds of the torn half sheet she might have noticed that her bag was hanging open on her arm; in fact, what had possessed her to forget the letter when the object of her visit to Echo Farm had been returning Obadiah's property to him?

A maddening pain in her injured ankle as she moved thoughtlessly supplied reason enough for her forgetfulness. Surely such a sprain was sufficient excuse! "Hello!" The cheery salutation came from the walk at the side of the veranda and glancing that way Peggy saw Jim climbing up and over the railing.

"Who's happened?" he demanded, glumping the steamer wires all through the town of Eagle Point. Earl Tucker of Brownboro was in Eagle Point Monday morning attending to business at the First State bank.
