Murder at High Tide

SYDNEY, N. S. W., May 31.—(AP)—The parents of a young girl, Granger, have been told that she died in the Parados cabin about 21 hours after she was found dead in the sea. The girl was found floating in the sea, and her body was recovered by a fisherman.

BROKEN ALIBIS

HAVE you the nerve to tell me that two guns equipped with silencers figured in the killing? Samuels inquired.

"There must have been two," Annersley said. Samuels lit a cigar. "All right. Where did you get that silencer?"

"You won't believe me, if I tell you." "Let's hear it anyhow." "My flat was broken into one night last year. I came home just as a man was getting away through the window. I managed to grab a revolver I had in my desk before he saw me. He lifted his own gun—that gun on the table—but I fired first and he dropped outside the window. Later I found his gun in the shrubbery and I concluded it had winged him. The gun was fitted with that silencer and I decided to keep it. The crook didn't get much."

"Thought it might come in handy, eh?" "You would say that," Annersley retorted bitterly. "I never occurred to me to do anything with it until a couple of weeks ago when Parados' attitude towards Miss Ferris became unendurable. I wondered if I could threaten him. It was a crazy notion—Parados was afraid of nothing on earth—but I had to do something."

"I think all of us felt the urge behind his words." "When I came here Saturday afternoon—ostensibly to see Celia—I had the gun with me." "Hunt was right. The gun was under that newspaper. I had thought Parados was alone. It shook me, finding Hunt there. I guess I was crazy. Anyhow, I went back again and this time I found Parados dead on the floor. He got what he deserved, whoever did it. The safe stood open and I got the papers I wanted about the Fleetwood deal. Miss Jaries checked too. I had a pretty good idea what the check meant. Miss Jaries came in then. That's all."

"Where are those papers?" Samuels demanded. "I destroyed them. Miss Jaries' check, too. Annersley looked at Miss Jaries, who had not moved from her chair. "You may be interested to know that I should never have used it against you."

"What have you to say about Granger?" Samuels demanded. "Nothing," Annersley replied. "I have told you the truth. You don't believe me. You'd better send me over."

"Claude, what are you saying?" Celia ran across the room toward him. Annersley caught her in his arms. "Claude, what is it? What are they doing to you?" "Hush, dear!" "But you must tell me! You said something about father. What is the matter?" "It'll turn out all right. Mr. Samuels doesn't understand."

"It's about—Parados—again?" "Yes, dear. Miss Jaries has told them. I suppose it had to come out." "Father, too?" "Yes, darling. But you mustn't expect Samuels to have your faith. They won't hold me long, Celia." She whirled out of his arms and toward Samuels.

"Try not to mind, dear," I said gently. "Annersley is in a bad mess—she doesn't know what she is saying."

"The girl is crazy," Mrs. Parados interposed coldly. "I'm sick of her hysterics. She probably knows all about it. You had better take her along with Annersley, Mr. Samuels."

Mrs. Parados turned her back and went out. "You don't think Celia really believed what she said?" Caroline whispered.

"Of course not! Don't you see what is facing her?" "Yes. Her father—and now Mr. Annersley. It's pitiful beyond belief. I wish she would let me help her." Caroline sighed. "None of us will be quite the same after this, Allan."

"I had been sure of this for a good while. It would not be necessary to explain that difference to Caroline." "Kirk, you turned Lum We loose?" Samuels demanded. "Last night," the big man answered.

"Take Annersley over there and lock him up. And tell Gridley to hop over with that gun and have Geddes look at it. Geddes has the bullets that rubbed out Parados and Granger. Tell Gridley to bring his report back with him."

"If the marks on the bullets match the rifling of the pistol I am guilty—is that it?" Annersley suddenly inquired. "That's it," Samuels grunted. "They'll match," he added grimly. "Get along with him, Kirk."

"Fluke took it into his pink head to halt the procession." "Another question, M. Annersley," he said brightly. "I thought they'd all been asked," Annersley retorted.

"Fluke chuckled and twirled his mustache. "Just a little question, but of an immense significance. When you entered by that patio window to find M. Parados dead on the floor, was the window open or shut? Monsieur will think carefully."

"The window was open," Annersley replied. "Fluke bowed. 'Merci, monsieur,' and he twirled his mustache again. As soon as we had risen from the breakfast table I followed Fluke into the sun room, although I knew he would not tell me any more than he wanted me to know. 'Monsieur is bewildered?' he inquired, settling himself into a chair.

"Did Annersley kill Parados and Granger?" I asked. "He chuckled. 'Has not M. le Deputy?' " "Never mind M. le Deputy," I interrupted irritably. "Can't you answer a straight question?" "Mon ami, it will not do, the simple yes or no, when I cannot prove what I know. You see? Life is—um—the word, M. l'Antiquaire?"

NORBLAD REASON HELD SUBTERFUGE

SALEM, Ore., May 31.—(AP)—In a statement to the Capital Journal today M. F. Corrigan of Minnville, removed this week by Governor Norblad from the state game commission, declares that the governor's statement that he was removing him to readjust the geographical location of the commission, was "a mere subterfuge to cloak the real issue, which is the protection of Warden Gifford."
