

Constipation--- The Insidious Enemy of Health

Bowel Movement Traced to Nerve Action

Constipation with its attending disorders is one of the most common of all human disorders...

Obstinate constipation is a term applied to those cases that cannot be reached by ordinary methods of physic.

It has been adequately proven by scientific experiment that the act of digestion and the propulsion of the contents of the bowels is produced and regulated by the brain through the spinal cord and spinal nerves...

From this evident fact deficient peristaltic motion must result from a lack of energy from the brain, which prevents this energy from reaching the intestines.

The nerves distributed to the intestines emit from the lower part of the spine between the vertebrae, or spinal segments, and these segments are slightly movable and are capable of being displaced by lifts, falls, etc.

There are thousands of satisfied patients today who know and can testify as to the merits of Chiropractic in dealing with this and other ailments which are common in people of the world over.

Murder at High Tide

SYNOPSIS: Anatole Fliques finds the murderer of Dan Parados where police search in vain. He reveals that the parlor window was open immediately after Parados was shot in that room. From this, a maid, Fliques obtains the story of Mrs. Parados' murder. She tells of her husband's nervousness just before the murder. She also tells of the murder scene in Mrs. Parados' bedroom, and how Mrs. Parados left her room for several minutes—just about the time her husband was murdered!

Chapter 29 STEEL SHAVINGS My experiences of the past three days had taught me the folly of jumping at conclusions. "Fliques," I proceeded cautiously, "what was in the pocket of Mrs. Parados' gown—her robin's-egg blue gown?"

"You have not guessed?" "I wouldn't have asked you if I had," I retorted. "Sometimes I wonder if your front of superior wisdom conceals any more than the rest of you!"

Fliques chuckled, seemingly undisturbed by my silly outburst. "Was not Friday madame's birthday and the anniversary of her marriage to monsieur?" he inquired.

If this was intended to enlighten me, it didn't. On Friday evening, I recalled, Fliques had offered Mrs. Parados his congratulations on the double significance of the day. She had received them with a good deal of perturbation, but I wasn't prepared to construe her reaction to them as evidence of guilt.

He frowned around the room, paying little attention to the power pan, but enormously interested in the lathe—a screw cutting lathe, I thought. I trailed him silently.

Suddenly a long steel rod, which tinned against the wall behind the lathe, attracted his attention and he pounced upon it. "Cre non de nom?" he whispered. The rod, rusted here and there, was some four feet long and perhaps a quarter of an inch thick.

One end of it was fitted into a sort of "head" slightly thicker than the rod itself. In this head was sunk an adjustable tooth-like device, the tooth being almost flush with the "head." The rod told me nothing, but Fliques' blue eyes were shining with excitement.

"What is it?" I demanded, for getting my resolution to keep quiet. "Non dieu, you do not know?" His next move made me forget my resentment. Dropping onto his knees, Fliques began to grope feverishly in the dust and dirt and scraps of metal beneath the lathe. I watched him, half inclined to doubt his sanity. After some minutes of meticulous groping he got up.

"Will you observe that, M. l'Anatre?" he inquired triumphantly. In the palm of his grimy hand lay a fragment of spiraled steel shaving, similar to the one he had found in Grainger's pocket, but an inch or so longer. It told me nothing except that Grainger had been machining some object on his lathe, and I admitted as much. Fliques chuckled and twirled his mustache. "Grainger, you think?" He dropped the shavings into an envelope. "Well, we shall see. My friend, they are living tissue, those shavings and that steel rod, and you do not perceive it is so." He shook his pink head sorrowfully. "But you have not the inward eye."

"They really tell you something?" I asked. "They tell me everything, monsieur. It was done by a clever one, that trick, and it is well that Anna told Fliques here." He twirled his mustache again. "Tonight we shall open the heart of our big mystery. But there are many things to do yet and perhaps mademoiselle is waiting for monsieur—" He paused and shrugged. "Clearly, he wanted me to go, so I left him, puzzling over what I had seen and heard. I was still groping when I came upon Caroline in the pergola. She wanted to know what was the matter. 'I have just left Fliques,' I explained, dropping beside her, 'and

ONTARIO TOWNS THREATENED BY FOREST FLAME

Four Believed Dead—Several Missing As Rangers Battle Fire in High Wind—Homes Abandoned.

PORT ARTHUR, Ont., June 2.—(AP)—With four persons believed dead, several others unaccounted for and numerous homesteads wiped out, rangers and volunteers today were battling a forest fire which threatened this town of 2,500 on the northwest shore of Lake Superior.

Flames, driven across hundreds of miles of timberland and underbrush by winds of gale force, reached Brent Park, a suburb of Port Arthur, and many residents had abandoned their homes before the progress of the fire was checked.

The most serious condition prevailed in the vicinity of 11 o'clock, 25 miles east of here, where William Mellenky, his wife and two children were believed to have perished when flames swept over their homestead.

A group of 21 workmen was cut off by the flames at a camp of the Provincial Paper company, north of Hickett. Efforts to reach them by airplane was frustrated by the dense smoke.

Paraders said that unless rain falls soon there was little hope of saving several small communities in the path of the fire.

ITALIANS BALK AT DISCARDING RIGHT TO KILL

New Penal Code Condemning Unwritten Law Meets With Disfavor—Late Case Brings Comment.

by ANDRUE BERDING Associated Press Staff Writer ROME, Italy.—(AP)—The "unwritten law" with its concomitant "right to kill," has been imbedded in Italy's legal philosophy for generations, and Italians seem unable to gather courage to discard it.

The new penal code of Minister of Justice Rocco, which condemns the "unwritten law," is meeting with adverse comment and doubt. Right now Rome is feverishly discussing the actuality by a jury of Aurelio de Baise, who shot and killed Captain Louis Maio of the 81st infantry, four times decorated for valor, because of De Baise's alibi.

De Baise met Maio by appointment, drew his revolver and shot the officer. He surrendered to the police and made an instant confession. In the jury said specifically that De Baise had no intention even of wounding Maio, let alone killing him. So there was nothing for the judge to do but release him.

When the new code goes into force these acquittals will be almost impossible. The code makes offenses of honor no excuse, for the minister of justice says there is no such thing as a "right to kill."

There on the verdict, however, are interesting. If Tevere, a strongly government newspaper, suggested to Minister Rocco that he had better change his code, for he could not hope to abolish passion by law. From the same case the newspaper Giornale d'Italia is inspired to write against the jury system.

"The verdict on De Baise is the clearest comment and best justification for the suppression of the popular magistrature, the jury."
