THE SPUN SILK STORY BRIEFLY TOLD

Spun silk is not an artificial fibre, nor imitation. Like raw silk, it is the true product of the silk worm. Its difference from raw silk lies in the manner in which it is drawn from the silk cocoon.

As is well known, the process of reeling kills the silkworm before it has reached maturity; therefore a certain number of cocoons must be permitted to mature, and the silk moth to emerge and carry on the life cycle. The escaping moth pierces the fibres at one end, leaving a cocoon formed of shorter fibres, instead of one continuous strand. These fibres are then boiled off the cocoon and spun together to form a continuous thread which is known as spun silk. The boiling-off process which is a feature of the spun silk manufacturing process insures its complete washability.

Spun silk yarns are sometimes used in single form; sometimes several ends are twisted together. These yarns are extremely soft and pliable, with a distinctive dulled surface, rather than a high sheen.

Spun silk fabrics are new and smart. They are highlights of the new sports vogue. Spun silk is used extensively in combination with raw silk, in the production of a wide variety of silk fabrics, such as sport silks, satin-back moires, chiffon velvets, failles and silk-and-wool combinations. When you come to washable silks for Spring and Summer of 1930, spun silk fabrics are practically indispensable fashion correct.
