A NICE GIRL COMES TO TOWN

By Maysie Greig

Mary Lou's cousin, Jay, lived in Chelsea. She had married Jerry Jerome, who worked on a morning newspaper. Jay, who kept a small, exclusive gown shop, made more money than Jerry did. Neither Jay nor Jerry was home when Brynmor and Mary Lou arrived, but Jay had left a note explaining that both of them were working late that night. She apparently had assumed that Mary Lou would go out with Brynmor. "I'll dash off and pick up a couple seats for a theater," Brynmor said. "Be back for you in an hour, is that o. k.?" "Wonderful!" Mary Lou exclaimed, and Brynmor went so quickly that she was left bewildered. "We're strange to each other," she mused. "But I'm sure it will be different when we've seen more of each other." Yet she couldn't deny there was a difference between this Brynmor and her summer hero. He hadn't kissed her, hadn't even called her pet names as he used to do—last summer. "I wonder—" she began. Then she shook her head stubbornly. "Nothing can possibly be wrong—not when I've counted so much on these two weeks in town."

"Please don't think me impertinent," Tony ventured, "but I'd like to dance with you."

that tightened the muscles in his throat. Clarice, with her fiery red hair and provoking half-shut amber eyes, affected men that way. And now, within a few minutes, he must face Mary Lou. "Idiot that I was!" Brynmor muttered. "Should have known a summer flirtation wouldn't last. Just a blue sky, a sea breeze and a girl—any girl, so long as she's pretty." Mary Lou had been pretty in her fresh, unsophisticated way. But, oh, how green! Why had this ghastly holiday ever been planned? Yet, Brynmor recalled, he had suggested it originally. Mary Lou had cousins in town; he had urged her to visit them. He would take her to London's best theaters, London's leading dancers. He stared moodily at the station ceiling, disgusted with the whole situation. "Hello, Brynmor, were you expecting me to drop from the ceiling?" He turned, startled. "Jove, Mary Lou!" There she was, smiling uncertainly, flushed with embarrassment. Absent-mindedly, he had forgotten to scan the passengers as they stepped from the train. "Had a nice trip?" Brynmor reached for her dainty satchel. "Fine." "Should I kiss her?" Brynmor thought. "Gosh, she's worse than I imagined. Where did she get that antiquated coat?" The coat wasn't London. It proclaimed to the world its provincial origin. It was much too long. "It's great that you're here," Brynmor made another valiant effort as he halted a cab. "Isn't it? I've been so looking forward to it." "I suppose your cousins will expect you to spend tonight with them, he hazarded as they drove toward Chelsea. "Too much to hope for any of your time this first night." "Why, I—I wrote and explained I was coming mainly to see you," Mary Lou faltered. Meanwhile Brynmor had hastened to Clarice's flat. He meant to stay five minutes, just to explain things. Clarice danced at the "Emerald Dragon," newest and smartest of the night clubs in Soho. Brynmor went every night to watch her, to dance with her, and to take her home. He knew little or nothing of Clarice's past, but her clever indifference had intrigued him. Brynmor found her curled up on a divan. Her room, richly furnished, was a symbol of the luxury that Clarice loved. "I suppose I must look after her," Brynmor said, as he finished the story of Mary Lou's arrival. "Are you sure," Clarice remarked, "that you're not the least bit keen on this Mary Lou?" "Nonsense, Clarice! How can you say that?" Brynmor exploded. "You know..." She looked at him with those haunting, half-closed eyes. "What girl ever knows? This girl thought she knew, too. Otherwise she never would have come." "But you're different, Clarice. I—I love you," Brynmor, though only 22, was desperately in earnest. "We think we're different, but I wonder..." "Stop talking that way. You're perfect... ideal." "Why don't you bring this Mary Lou to the Emerald Dragon? I'd like to see her," Clarice murmured. "Why should I be jealous?" "You shouldn't," Brynmor rejoined. "I will bring her." She sprang to her feet. "Let's mix some cocktails and dance. I have some new records." "Oh, gosh," Brynmor groaned. "I ought to fetch that girl." "Dance," Clarice insisted. She clasped a bare arm about his neck. Brynmor danced. He stayed an hour, an hour and a half. Mary Lou waited—and waited. It seemed as if Brynmor never would come. She explored Jay's flat, paced the floor. What could be keeping him? She tried on her newest dress, a pink georgette. It was all right for Frinwood, where she lived, but somehow there was too much of a suggestion of "homemade" about it for London. Finally Brynmor arrived, profuse with apologies. Immediately he rushed her to his club for something to eat before the theater. He sent a porter to get seats for "any
